Phœnicaceæ (fē-ni-kā'se-ē), n. the palm family of trees comprising about 140 genera and 1,200 species.
phonautograph (fo-naw'tō-gråf), n. an instrument for recording the vibrations of sound: forerunner of the phonograph.
Phœnician (fe-nish'ån), adj. pertaining to ancient Phœnicia, or to its inhabitants.
phœnix, same as phenix.
phone (fōn), n. abbreviation of telephone; an element of speech; a single articulate sound; a receiver used in radiotelephony.
phoneidoscope (fo-nī'dō-skōp), n. an instrument for studying the movements of sounding bodies by optical observations.
phonendoscope (fō-nen'dō-skōp), n. an improved stethoscope in which the sounds are intensified by disks of vulcanite or other vibrating material.
phonesis (fō-nē'sis), n. the utterance of vocal sounds.
phonetic (fō-net'ik), adj. pertaining to the voice or sounds; representing the simple elementary sounds: n.pl. the science of sounds, especially of the human voice.
phonetically (-ål-li), adv. by sounds.
phonic (fō'nik), adj. pertaining to vocal sound: pl. the science of speech sounds; phonetics; acoustics.
phonogram (fō'nō-gram), n. articulate sound as recorded by the phonograph; a written character representing a particular sound.
phonograph ('nō-gråf), n. a letter or character indicating a distinct spoken sound; an instrument to record or reproduce articulate speech or sounds.
phonographer (fo-nog'rå-fēr), n. one skilled in using a phonograph; one versed in phonography, or the system of writing according to sound.
phonographic ('ik), adj. pertaining to or representing, articulate sounds, or to phonography.
phonography (-nog'rå-fi), n. a description of sounds uttered by the human voice; a system of shorthand, by which every sound is represented by a separate character or mark, especially the system invented by Sir Isaac Pitman.
phonology (-nol'ō-ji), n. the science of articulate sounds.
phonometer (fo-nom'e-tēr), n. an instrument for measuring the intensity of sounds and the frequency of vibrations.
phonoscope (fō'nō-skōp), n. an instrument for observing the motions of sounding bodies, or producing luminous figures by vibrations.
phonotype ('nō-tīp), n. a phonetic type.
phonotypy ('nō-tī-pi), n. a method of printing each vocal sound by a distinct type.
phormium (fôr'mi-um), n. New Zealand flax. phosphate (fos'fāt), n. a salt of phosphoric acid.
phosphaturia (-få-tū'ri-å), n. excess of phosphates in the urine.
phosphene (fos'fēn), n. the luminescence resulting from closing the eye and pressing or rubbing the eyeball.
phosphide, same as phosphuret.
phosphite (fīt), n. a salt of phosphorous acid.
phosphorate ('fo-rāt), v.t. to combine with phosphorus.
phosphoresce (-fo-res'), v.i. to emit light like phosphorus.
phosphorescence ('ens), n. emission of light under certain conditions by substances at common temperatures; faint light.
phosphorescent ('ent), adj. luminous.
phosphoric (-for'ik), adj. pertaining to, like, or obtained from, phosphorus.
phosphoric acid (-for'ik as'id), n. a crystalline substance resembling syrup, obtained by the oxidation, or decomposition of phosphates.
phosphorous (fos'for-us), adj. pertaining to, resembling, or containing phosphorus.
phosphorous acid ('for-us as'id), n. an acid formed by the union of 1 atom of phosphorus and 3 atoms of oxygen.
phosphorus ('for-us), n. a yellowish, wax-like, inflammable, non-metallic element, of the nitrogen group, luminous in the dark.
phosphuret ('fū-ret), n. a combination of phosphorus with a metallic base.
phosphuretted ('ed), adj. combined with phosphorus.
photic (fō'tik), adj. denoting the production of light by the lower animals.
photism (fō'tizm), n. hallucinatory luminescence: luminous appearance.

photochromography (-krō-mog'rå-fi), n. the art of printing or reproducing photographic images in color.

photochromy (fo'to-krō-mi), n. the art or process of photographing in colors.

photochronograph (-kron'o-gråf), n. an apparatus for recording very minute intervals of time; instrument for taking star transits.

photodrama (-drä'må), n. a moving picture interpreting some dramatic story.

photodynamic (-nam'ik), adj. operating by the energy of light.

photodynamics (-di-nam'iks), n. influence of light on plant development; study of plant-curves produced by action of light.

photoengraving (fō'to-en-grāv'ing), n. a process for producing printing blocks or plates by photography.

photogen ('tō-jen), n. an inflammable hydrocarbon; paraffin.

photoglyphy (-tog'li-fi), n. a process of engraving by which photographs are etched into metal plates by the action of light and chemicals.

photograph ('tō-gråf), n. a photographic picture: v.t. to take a picture of by means of photography.

photographic (-gråf'ik), adj. pertaining to, or produced by, photography.

photography (-tog'rå-fi), n. the art or process of producing pictures by the action of light on certain substances sensitized by various chemical processes.

photogravure (-tō-grå-vūr'), n. the process of producing by photography on a sensitized surface an incised engraved metal plate.

photoheliograph (-hē'li-ō-gråf), n. a photographic telescope or camera for depicting solar spots, transits, etc.

photophone ('tō-fōn), n. an instrument for communicating sounds by the agency of light.

photolithograph (-lith'ō-gråf), n. a lithographic picture made from a photograph.

photolithography (-fi), n. the art of producing on stone printing impressions, from which lithographs can be taken.

photology (-tol'ō-ji), n. the science of light: optics.

photolysis (-tol'i-sis), n. chemical decomposition through the action of light.

photometer (-tom'e-tēr), n. an instrument for measuring the intensity of light, or comparing the relative intensity of different lights.

photometry (-tom'e-tri), n. the art of measuring the intensity of light.

photomicrography (-mī-krog'rå-fi), n. the art of enlarging photographs by attaching the camera to a microscope.

photophilous (-tof'i-lus), adj. loving light; thriving in strong light.

photophobia (-fō'bi-å), n. a morbid dread or fear of light.

photophone (fō'to-fōn), n. a form of Bell telephone for transmitting speech by means of light reflected from a vibrating selenium diaphragm.

photophore (fō'tō-fōr), n. a luminous spot on certain marine fishes; a surgical instrument for examining a hollow organ by means of electric light.

photoplay (fō'tō-plā), n. a moving-picture play.

photoplaywright (-rīt), n. a writer of scenarios.

photopsia (top'si-å), n. a morbid affection of the eyes in which corruscations of light appear to play before them.

photoradiogram (fō-to-rā'di-o-gråm), n. a photograph or picture transmitted by wireless.

photoscope (fō'tō-skōp), n. an instrument for measuring the intensity of light; an apparatus for magnifying photographs.

photosphere ('tō-sfēr), n. the luminous envelope of the sun.

photostat (fō'tō-stat), n. an apparatus for making photographic copies of drawings, maps, etc., without a negative on prepared paper: a trade name.

phototaxis (-tak'sis), n. influence of light on the movements of certain of the lower organisms, as algæ and infusorians.

phototelegraphy (-te-leg'rå-fi), n. telegraphy by light, as flashings of a heliograph.

phototelephony (te-lef'ō-ni), n. a method of sending photographs over a telephone wire by means of corresponding apparatus at the sending and receiving end: a beam of light is passed through a lens and directed upon the photographic film to be transmitted, which is enclosed in a cylinder. As the cylinder revolves the point of light passes through the transparent film and falls upon a potassium pencil which runs through the center of the cylinder. This piece of potassium forms a highly sensitive photo-electric cell, and when light falls on it the electrons fly from the surface of the potassium, forming an electric current, the fluctuations of which are imposed on the direct current which flows through the telephone wires and which reproduce every variation at the receiving end on a similar sensitized film. The first successful pictures sent by this method were photographs from the Republican Convention held at Cleveland, in June, 1924.

phototherapy (fō-tō-ther'a-pi), n. method of curing disease by light-rays, electric or solar, focussed on affected parts.

phototropism (fo-tot'ro-pizm), n. the tendency of growing plants to move or curve under the influence of light.

phototype ('tō-tīp), n. a plate produced by photography from which engravings, etc., can be printed; the process itself; a picture printed from such plate.

photozincography (-zing-kog'rå-fi), n. a process by which zinc blocks are prepared for printing from.

phrase (frāz), n. a part of a sentence; brief pithy expression; idiom; style or manner: v.t. to style; express in appropriate words.

phraseology (-e-ol'o-ji), n. style, manner, or peculiarity of expression; a collection of phrases.

The Study and Use of To-day's English

MORE than a list of words is needed by those who wish to keep pace with the growth of our language. The preceding vocabulary is the largest, the newest and most usable list of words and word information to be found in any similar Dictionary.

Added to this, the following pages contain dramatic accounts of how our language originated and grew, stories of word building, the choice of words, the correct arrangement of words, the sources of our vocabulary, punctuation, when to use capital letters, etc., etc., and a classified Supplementary Dictionary of sporting, technical, professional and political terms, such as cannot be found in any other one book.

THE EVOLUTION OF ENGLISH DICTIONARIES

By JOHN C. ROLFE, Ph. D.

Professor in the University of Pennsylvania, Member of the National Academy of Social Science

The Dictionary is our most general and most helpful book of reference. Few homes are without some one of its manifold forms, and it is appealed to as an authority on the correct spelling of words, their pronunciation, and their exact shades of meaning. In the larger dictionaries, and to some extent in their abridgments, we expect to find also the derivation of words, as well as a certain amount of encyclopedic information, frequently made clearer by appropriate illustrations. There is commonly an Appendix too, containing a variety of miscellaneous information, judiciously selected and conveniently arranged. In short, if one were for any reason limited to a single book of reference, one's choice would ordinarily, and quite naturally, be the Dictionary.

The evolution of so convenient and comprehensive a manual has been the result of a long process of development, extending over many centuries. Its course is marked by a relatively small number of epoch-making works, each of which held the field, directly or indirectly through revisions and imitations, for long terms of years. Like so many other of our institutions, its origin and growth cannot clearly be understood without going back to those peoples to whom we owe so much that they must always hold a prominent place in any sound educational system, the Greeks and Romans.

The name "dictionary," from dictionarius (liber) or dictionarium, originally meant a "word-book." It had as rivals numerous other terms, such as lexicon (the Greek form of "word-book"), glossary, vocabulary, and the like. Its victory over all of them has been so complete, that "dictionary" is not only the most common designation of a word-book, but is extended to other handbooks alphabetically arranged, such as dictionaries of antiquities, of quotations, of biography, and similar works. Even the alphabetical order, or "dictionary order" as it is sometimes called, which seems to us so obviously the best, had a long contest with the arrangement by subjects or classes, and was not universally adopted until toward the end of the sixteenth century. The alphabetical arrangement itself passed through various stages, beginning with lists of words having the same initial letter but not otherwise differentiated, passing to lists alphabetized by the first two letters, and culminating in our present system.

Dictionaries are in general of two kinds: those in which the words of one language are defined in terms of another, and those in which the words of a language are explained or defined in the same tongue. The former become necessary when foreign languages are studied, the latter when a speech has reached such a stage of development as to contain words which are not readily understood by the general public.

The first word-books were the glossaries used by the Greek schoolboys of the fifth century before our era, to master the meanings of the obsolete and poetic words in their national reading-book, the poems of Homer. These glossaries were gradually expanded and amplified until Philetas of Cos, who lived between 325 and 265 B.C., compiled what might be called the first Homeric Lexicon. As time went on, other special lexicons were made, and finally, toward the end of the first century of our era, the first general Greek Dictionary was begun by Zophyrion and completed by Pamphilus of Alexandria.

Similar educational conditions existed among the Romans, and the glossaries made to explain unfamiliar words led at last to the great dictionary of Verrius Flaccus, of the time of Augustus. This lexicon was so large that it was twice abridged, by Festus and Paulus Diaconus. Only the latter has been preserved, along with some portions of the earlier epitome of Festus. Verrius illustrated the meaning and use of words by quotations, which give the work its principal value for modern scholars, and also introduced some encyclopedic matter. It will be seen that much of the ground gained in the course of so many centuries was lost during the Dark Ages, and that our English dictionaries practically began again at the beginning and passed through the same stages of growth, although at last they far outstripped their prototypes in the ancient world.

After lexicography had lain dormant for some time, it was given a fresh impulse by the Revival of Learning and the use of Latin as a means of communication among educated men of different nationalities. Vocabularies became necessary, which at first explained the meaning of words in simpler Latin, but tended more and more to use the vernacular. In England the making of such word-books began between 600 and 700 A.D., but their development was retarded for more than three centuries by the Norman Conquest, since it was not until the close of the fourteenth century that English finally gained the ascendancy over French and became the recognized language of the schools.

The period which followed the victory of the mother tongue is marked by the appearance of a great number of Latin-English word-books, not yet called dictionaries, but bearing various fanciful titles, such as Medulla Grammatices, or "Marrow of Grammar," Ortus (i.e. Hortus) Vocabulorum, or "Garden of Words," and the like. A second stage is represented by the Promptorium Parvulorum, the "Children's Storehouse," which contained about 10,000 English words with their Latin equivalents. The first work of the kind to be termed a "Dictionary" was that of Sir Thomas Elyot, Knight, issued in 1538. The number of Latin-English and English-Latin lexicons is very large and they show a consistent improvement. Space does not permit an enumeration even of those of epoch-making importance; it may merely be remarked that owing to the high demands made by the modern science of lexicography, we have as yet no dictionary either of Greek or of Latin which is regarded as adequate. In the case of Latin the deficiency is gradually being supplied at this writing by the Thesaurus Linguae Latinae, published with the support of a number of great Academies of Europe. The printing of this mammoth work began in 1900.

The next forward step was made by Richard Howlet, whose Abecedarium, issued in 1552, besides giving the Latin equivalents for a large number of English words, also gave English definitions of some of the more difficult terms. Next, the dying out of Latin as a means of communication led to a more general study of the modern languages. Dante had long since made an appeal for greater attention to Italian in his De Vulgari Eloquio, but it was not until the early part of the sixteenth century that Dictionaries of English in connection with a modern language were put forth. One of the earliest was the Esclarcissement de la Langue Francoyse (1530), which was soon followed by dictionaries of Spanish and Italian, and shortly afterwards by a polyglot lexicon in eleven languages, called the Ductor in Linguas, or "Guide into Tongues."

Dictionaries of Greek, Latin and the modern foreign languages had an obvious practical purpose, but the necessity for an English dictionary did not suggest itself until the end of the sixteenth century, when it was brought to mind by the introduction into our tongue of many learned or "book" words, the meaning of which could not be grasped in the ordinary way, but required definition by specialists. Thus English dictionaries had in the beginning the same aim as the glossaries of the Greeks and Romans; that is, the definition of the "hard" words of the language.

This is explicitly set forth in the title of Robert Cawdrey's Table Alphabeticall of Hard Words, published in 1604, in which he explains the meaning of about 3,000 such terms. His work passed through three editions and then gave place to the English Expositor, or Exposition of Hard Words, of John Bullokar (1616). A new departure was made by the English Dictionary of Henry Cockeram (1623), which consisted of three parts. The first contained the "hard" words with their definitions, but the second gave a list of ordinary words provided with their learned equivalents, thus enabling the ambitious and industrious to substitute elegant and high-sounding terms for those current in every-day life, and so improve their style and conversation. The third part furnished an explanation of the classical, historical and mythological allusions met with in literature, besides giving information about important personages, marvellous animals, and the like.

In 1656 a Glossographia, an explanation of obscure legal terms, was published by Thomas Blount, who enlivened the sober annals of the science by his controversy with Edward Phillips, declaring that the latter's New World of Words and Nomothetes were clumsy plagiarisms of his own books. But the general tendency was to add more and more of the common words of the language. A series of dictionaries by Coles (1677), Cocker (1704), and Kersey (1708), continued this good work, and finally, in 1721, Nathaniel Bailey issued his Universal Etymological English Dictionary. This was the first work of the kind to aim at a complete collection of all the words of our mother tongue, a step made necessary by the special attention which was given to etymology. For while the editor did not consider it essential to give a common word like "cat" a fuller definition than "a creature well known," the derivation of all words was equally important. Bailey's work at once proved popular and went through a number of editions. In that of 1731 he marked a further advance by indicating the proper accentuation of the words. His Dictionary also included many legal and technical terms, as well as "the Etymology and Interpretation of Proper Names of Men and Women and Remarkable Places in Great Britain." In 1730, with the help of several specialists, Bailey brought out his folio edition, into which he introduced diagrams and proverbs. An interleaved copy of this edition formed the working basis for Johnson's Dictionary.

Dr. James A. H. Murray has pointed out in his Romanes lecture of 1900 that many of these dictionaries owed their existence to the needs of women, whose educational advantages were less than those of men, a fact which is given quaint expression in their dedications and title-pages. Cockeram's book, for example, announced its purpose as being that of "enabling as well as Ladies and Gentlewomen . . . as also Strangers of any Nation to the understanding of the more difficult authors already printed in our language, and the more speedy attaining of an elegant perfection of the English tongue, both in reading, speaking, and writing," while Blount's Glossographia was dedicated to the use of "the more-knowing Women and less-knowing Men."

Bailey had many rivals and competitors, who followed the same general plan, among them Dyche and Pardon (1735), B. N. Defoe (1735) and Benjamin Martin (1749). The next step in advance was prompted by a feeling among literary men and booksellers of the need for a "standard dictionary," the purpose of which should be to "fix the language" and prevent its deterioration. This erroneous conception of the nature of speech was not confined to England, but the example had already been set by the Accademia della Crusca in Italy and the Académie Française. The latter had in fact published a dictionary, the fruit of twenty years of preparation and forty of labor, from which all technical terms were rigidly excluded, as well as all other words which did not receive the stamp of academic approval. We now realize that such a notion is a perverted one, and that a dictionary should be an inventory of the language and not a "Who's Who?" of diction. At the time, however, the plan met with general approval, and in 1747 a syndicate of London booksellers contracted with Samuel Johnson to produce such a book within three years for the consideration of 1500 guineas. Johnson thereupon addressed a memorial on the "Plan of a Dictionary of the English Language" to Lord Chesterfield, in the hope of securing his patronage for the enterprise. It was not until Johnson had nearly completed his great task that the noble lord paid any attention to the matter, and then his tardy aid and encouragement were rejected by the indignant lexicographer. The work had in fact taken eight years and a half, and the greater part of the stipend had been exhausted in the pay of six amanuenses and in other incidental expenses.

The feature which made Johnson's Dictionary epoch-making was the attention given to the historical development of the language and the illustration of the uses of words by well-selected quotations. These quotations were entirely supplied by the editor and were for the most part made from memory; but though frequently not verbally exact, they are almost always sufficiently so to be entirely adequate to their purpose. Johnson also prided himself on his etymologies, but his original contributions in that line have gone the way of the greater number of those which preceded the modern days of scientific etymology. There are some definitions in which the editor allowed his sense of humor or his personal feelings to get the better of strict accuracy and literary decorum. Thus he defines a lexicographer as "a maker of dictionaries, a harmless drudge," and a pensioner as "a Slave of the State, hired by a stipend to obey his master." Other well-known examples are oats, whig, tory, and excise, which is said to be a "hateful tax, levied upon commodities and adjudged not by the common judges of property, but by wretches hired by those to whom the excise is paid." His work was not free from errors, but he in part disarmed criticism in his Preface by freely admitting their possibility. He was true scholar enough to acknowledge his slips, and when a lady once asked him how he came to define pastern as "the knee of a horse," he replied, "Ignorance, Madam, pure ignorance."

The value of Johnson's work was immediately recognized and it passed into a second edition within a year. It was some forty years, however, in wholly supplanting Bailey's Dictionary and others of that type; but it finally became the standard and held the field for many years.

The next feature to be added to our dictionaries was the systematic and accurate indication of pronunciation. Bailey and Johnson had indicated the proper accentuation of words, but had made no further attempt to show their sounds. This was first done by William Kenrick (1773), who was followed in 1780 by Thomas Sheridan, father of the famous dramatist. In 1791 John Walker, a former actor and lecturer on elocution, issued his Critical Pronouncing Dictionary, which became as great an authority on pronunciation as Johnson was on definition and quotation. Except for this addition, the efforts of lexicographers for many years after the publication of Johnson's Dictionary were confined to attempts to supplement and perfect that work. It was reprinted and revised many times, the best edition being that of the Rev. H. J. Todd (London, 1818), which is not yet wholly superseded.

The first to enter into competition with Johnson by making an independent work was Charles Richardson, whose New Dictionary of the English Language (1837) was based upon the theory that definition was a subordinate matter and illustration by quotation the essential thing. The result was an extremely valuable repertory of passages from the best writers from 1300 down to his own time, but the plan of the work prevented it from being a popular success.

Meanwhile the first great American lexicographer, Noah Webster (1758–1843), had begun a series of dictionaries which culminated in the American Dictionary of the English Language. This work was based upon a new and extensive collection of material, and as the name implies, was an American dictionary, introducing words which had hitherto been regarded as provincial and illustrating usage by quotations from American as well as from British writers. He did not even confine himself to the best authors, believing that "language was an instrument not so much of literature as of daily association." He gave elaborate rules for spelling and pronunciation and in various appendices, as well as in the definitions of certain words, he included much encyclopedic matter. The work appeared in several editions during its author's lifetime, and was continued after his death by his son-in-law Chauncey Allen Goodrich (1790–1860), and later by Noah Porter (1811–1892), President of Yale College. For many years the supremacy of Webster's Dictionary in America was disputed by that of Joseph Emerson Worcester (1784–1865), who differed from Webster on many points of spelling and pronunciation, as well as in treating the language objectively rather than didactically. The victory in the "war of dictionaries" seems to have rested with Webster, although his etymologies, which were the least successful part of his work, have been generally discarded, while many of the characteristic features of the book have been modified or dropped. It still bears the name of its founder, but in its title American has given place to International.

The final step in English lexicography is represented by the New English Dictionary on Historical Principles, the publication of which began at Oxford in 1884 and is now nearing completion. Its aim is to record the full history of every word which has ever existed in our language during the last 800 years, with its proper spellings, pronunciation, etymology and definitions, and with quotations illustrating its usage.

This monumental work is purely a word-book, without encyclopedic matter. The latter feature was given special prominence by John Ogilvie in his English Dictionary, Technical and Scientific, first published in 1850 and afterwards in several editions, finally appearing as the Imperial Dictionary of the English Language. This work has had a profound influence on all our dictionaries except the New Oxford, all of which contain a greater or less amount of encyclopedic material and a profusion of illustrations.

STANDARD ENGLISH

By PERCY W. LONG, A.M., Ph.D.

Instructor in English in Harvard University, Secretary of the American Dialect Society, of the Editorial Staff of Webster's New International Dictionary, Etc.

The choice of words, among the many thousands which are available for general use, marks, better than any other criterion, the range of one's command of the resources of a language. For although accuracy in pronunciation serves, as a rule, to distinguish the educated from the uneducated, and to gain for them that recognition which is accorded to persons sensitive to the finer elements of culture, it is among such persons a token of intellectual distinction to find at the right moment the right word, showing in this nicety of adjustment a precision of idea and a command of the means of expression beyond what is common. So much is not demanded of the majority of moderately educated men; to them the use of the standard language is a matter, not of artistic proficiency, but of everyday correctness. And the importance of this correctness is obvious to the business man as well as to the student in so far as it concerns his own social and commercial life. What is usually less obvious is its importance to the community; that is to the nation, or more generally the several countries which in common speak the English language. The great convenience of a language which encircles the globe and is understood from Alaska to Cape Town would be seriously diminished if the great agencies of our common culture, the schools, the pulpit, the newspapers, and the dictionaries, did not labor incessantly to keep in check the little variations which tend to disintegrate our common heritage. Local peculiarities of pronunciation, local innovations in words and new meanings attached to the old words would in no long time establish a variety of dialects such as those of Italy, where the peasant from near Naples cannot converse with his countryman of Venice unless through an artificial literary language acquired in school.

From some such variety of dialects the English standard language arose at the time of Chaucer and of Wyclif's translation of the Bible. Since that time, though in England the dialects have maintained themselves among the illiterate, a clear tradition established by the court, the church and the universities has been disseminated throughout the masses of English-speaking people. To this tradition it is encumbent on those who wish to speak and write well to conform.

The court of appeal to which the average individual must resort in case of doubt is the dictionary. But the consulter of the dictionary should recognize that its function—at any rate in recent times—is not to legislate regarding usages. Dr. Johnson, indeed, did so. But his celebrated dictionary of 1755 represented a movement initiated in the group of Swift, Addison, and Pope to compose a dictionary which should fix in one perfect form forever an unalterable English language. Many scholars then believed, and all now know, that even greater recognition than the following which Johnson secured among American as well as English authors, could not stay the flux of language. Even the Roman rhetorician Quintilian had recognized that fashions in words must change. The dictionary therefore records what is in good use now. Its sources are the great conservative centers of intellectual authority—the educational world, the pulpit, and distinguished authors. To these in Europe, notably in England and Germany, may be added the spoken language of classical and serious modern drama. That no one of these constitutes an ideal guide results from the inevitable intellectual and temperamental variations to which individual professions are subject. The pedantry of the schoolmaster contrasts with the simple emotional appeal of the actor; the wit of a keen editorial would not become the decorum of the cloth. As in the well-educated man almost any one of the elements that go to make up education may be lacking, so in the speaker or writer of good English individual virtues and vices of language distinguish the real from the ideal.

Yet certain principles of choice will keep one from going far wrong. One should use in language that sense of refinement, which checks one from conspicuousness or eccentricity in clothes and in conduct. To say that one should be unobtrusive is good advice only to those who cannot excel. But in seeking to excel one should avoid the outlandish, using only such language as good sense warrants. Long words which call attention to themselves are rarely in good taste. This is as much as to say that language should be adapted to the hearers, to the audience and to the occasion. An address concerning a coal strike delivered at a Bostonian thé dansant would not serve for miners in their shirt sleeves. Without citing extremes, everyone will recognize the difference between formal occasions, such as public lectures, and informal, when a simpler range of words and certainly a simpler form of sentences would alone be in keeping.

Often in conflict with this principle of adapting language not only to the temperament but to the intelligence of those about one, a principle of even greater importance should control one bent on acquiring command of language —that of seeking to express one's idea with precision. Often to convey an idea with clearness will require a phrase, when to express it exactly requires but a word, because the specific word does not come to mind or because the audience cannot be trusted to comprehend its meaning. The "provenience of seicentismo concetti" serves for some one hundred words not of an elaborately technical character, but should be used only in addressing truly erudite persons. The very citation of such a phrase emphasizes the supreme importance of simplicity as a means to clearness. And yet undeviating allegiance to simplicity would leave everyone in the language of childhood. A compromise between such simplicity and an endeavor to carry upward the standard of one's environment is truer taste than the safer nonchalance of negative unobtrusiveness.

Of the words which come to us from unaccredited sources, Americans are peculiarly exposed to the influx of foreign words, creating in local centers temporary mixed languages which permanently affect in various small ways the speech of districts. Especially difficult to avoid is the influence on pronunciation. A standard American pronunciation, enforced throughout our schools as a counter to the growing individualization of the northeast, southeast, and west, would do more to resist this tendency than individual efforts can hope to. To nationalize the British standard is a futile endeavor; we must say ben or bin, and not been. We cannot pronounce trait as tray or chivalry with tch. But any large influx of foreign words would go further; it would make for serious difficulty in intelligibility.

The outcome of this tendency usage will decide in time. For time, though slowly, transforms speech so that the speech of five hundred years ago would be hard to follow, and Juliet would seem to us to speak with a brogue. Changes are constantly in progress. New words creep in; old words fade gradually from memory. One can hardly do better than quote Pope's famous couplet:

> "Be not the first by whom the new are tried, > Nor yet the last to lay the old aside."

Today one would not hesitate as in 1900 to use the words graft and automobile. Perhaps in 1930 peeved will have won its way to good repute. It has not done so as yet. On the other hand, certain authors have sustained injury by a fondness for words already nearly obsolete. They spoiled for many the golden melody of Spenser's verse. And we deem it an affectation when a writer uses whilom, forsooth, and the like, as a part of his own speech.

A danger less likely to beset consulters of dictionaries, but certainly more conspicuous in general conversation, especially at the showing-off age, is that of indiscriminately using slang. While only pedantry will deprecate the occasional use of a slang term when it felicitously conveys a specific thought or feeling, a regard for definiteness in thinking will condemn the meaningless iteration of a few stock phrases as equally applicable to the most incongruous things. Besides the vagueness, slang injures through its tendency to express the more vulgar, trivial, and commonplace points of view toward life, insensibly cheapening the whole intellectual tone of one habituated to its influence. The expression I should worry, is but equivalent to the similar Old French non mi cale, from which we have nonchalance; but the user of the latter term, if aware of its meaning, looks at that meaning critically rather than feels it. Soon, however, the slang lost its expressiveness of a mood, becoming a mere catchword or gag. Other slang satisfies a permanent need, gains favor, and is in repute. Swift fought for years the abbreviation mob for mobile vulgus, fickle rabble, as disconcerted faculties today combat prof.

Standard English

The standard language consists of those expressions which are exempt from criticism on the scores of being (1) too old or too new; (2) too local or still alien; and (3) beneath a reasonable tone of refinement. But within this chosen group must be distinguished two classes of terms: one to be used universally and one only to special groups of persons; namely, general and technical words. General words, in this sense are those known to the generality of people and embrace relatively but a few thousand, to which, however, in the main this article has been confined. Technical words, to the contrary, will be recognized by few not specially interested in the subject matter of the art, game, science, or craft with which they are involved. Castling in chess will serve as an example. Such words can be used but sparingly unless to persons of the particular group which they serve.

In addition to choosing words which are in themselves exempt from criticism, which express one's meaning and are suited to one's audience, the discriminating user of language is influenced by certain intellectual qualities. Of these the most essential is temperateness of expression. The hyperbole of vague enthusiasm or distaste manifests an uncritical and unreflective attitude of mind. It is usually a quickly recognized mark of intellectual inferiority, manifesting itself not only in the exaggeration which individual words imply, but even more in the use of such intensive expressions as very or less common incremental adverbs. Similar to this vice of hyperbole, though of more various character, is the tendency to use frequently qualifying words which modify the positive content of one's statements. Such an expression as of course when, if it be of course the statement need not be made, and when if it be not the expression is at best an irritating form of flattery, should be avoided. No doubt often implies actually the existence of doubt. Or, one's expression overstates and must be qualified, indicating original inability to achieve precise expression. This reveals poverty of vocabulary.

Within the compass of individual words not infrequently there exists a considerable choice, where several meanings of a word are still well known. Dainty is an instance; whether to apply it to a person of fastidious habits or to a thing palatable or otherwise agreeable to such a person. But applied to the person it may concern appearance or manner or tastes. There is, chiefly, a danger of too greatly extending the meaning of a word by confusion with some other through close association. This type of error, called "impropriety," or "malaprop" from Mrs. Malaprop in the "School for Scandal," is well illustrated by her own saying, "I'll precede along after you." Close akin to it are such solecisms as that which arise commonly in the misuse of liable for likely. One may be liable to arrest for overspeeding, and yet not likely to be arrested. Liable usually accompanies a noun, likely a verb. Another instance is the confusion between due and owing. This error arises from using due as if it also were a participle.

Among the correct uses of a word, it was once widely maintained that the primary or original meaning of a word is that toward which one should incline. Ruskin especially was addicted to resuscitating the original significance. This conservative tendency, so long as it avoids eccentricity, makes for stability. But its fundamental inapplicability appears in such a word as passion, which then must be used to denote "suffering," as occasionally it still does ("the passion of our Lord"); or in the word take, which originally meant "to give." A better principle for choosing is to use those meanings only which are widely intelligible, and of those that one which no other word conveys so clearly. Among synonyms choose the meanings which are least synonymous. This makes for clearness. Avoid the error of the schoolboy who wrote: "One fine day we took a nice drive up and got an elegant view."

As to the extent of his vocabulary, it were better not to inquire. The well-educated person uses from two to five thousand words; exceptionally gifted authors rarely double that number. And yet the acquisition of a vocabulary, which is so highly commended in Professor Palmer's Self Cultivation in English, is no great task if one were to resolve upon his advice to acquire regularly and use two new words a week. Ability to choose words rests upon the ready command of many, just as lapses into error usually arise from command of too few. Therefore to enlarge the vocabulary best makes for the attainment and spread of standard English.

PRACTICAL SYNTAX

By FORREST S. LUNT, M.A.

Instructor of English, Horace Mann School, Teachers College, Columbia University

It is the purpose of this article to present to the general reader in a brief and somewhat informal manner the more common principles of syntax. The historical phase of syntax is not presented. The clientele to which such a volume as this will appeal will find the following discussion of syntactical relationships of practical value.

Good usage, common practice, society—whatever you will—has decided what is good form, what is proper, in this field of syntax, just as it has in the fields of morals, etiquette, or fashions. Therefore the man or woman who has occasion to set his thoughts down in writing should observe the common practice, the universally understood rules which govern the relationship of words. If he fails to do so, or if he attempts to make his own rules, he will be considered as outside the pale of cultured, educated people. From this it will be seen that the ability to construct sentences properly is hardly less important than the power to speak.

The term used when referring to this relation which must exist between the various parts of sentences is Syntax. As has been said, Syntax involves the observance of established rules in the correct arrangement of words in good use. This phase of syntax is known as Grammar. In languages which are highly inflected the relations between the words is shown by the inflections. The English language is not highly inflected, having lost most of its inflected forms; the relations between the words in English sentences is shown by their grammatical order. The normal order of the words in English sentences is: first, the noun, with its modifiers; then the verb with its modifiers. The adjective modifiers of a noun usually follow it. In the case of verbs the modifiers may come before or after the verb. The modifiers of both the nouns and the verbs should be placed near to the words they are intended to modify.

All sentences may be divided into three general forms, namely:

(a) The simple sentence, which consists of one subject and one predicate, as The boy runs. In such a sentence boy is the subject, runs is the predicate.

(b) The compound sentence, which consists of two or more clauses of equal value, joined by a co-ordinate conjunction, as "The way was long and the day was cold." Here the clause the day was cold is equal in value to the way was long, and is joined to the first clause by the co-ordinate conjunction and.

(c) The complex sentence, which contains a main or principal clause and one or more subordinate clauses joined to the main clause by a subordinate conjunction, as The boy ran when he heard the bell. The main clause is the boy ran; the subordinate clause is when he heard the bell; the subordinate conjunction joining the two clauses is when. These three definitions classify all the sentence forms.

Every sentence requires a subject; this subject is said to be in the nominative case. It answers the question Who? or What? and the predicate or verb asserts something about it. The subject of a sentence may be either a noun or a pronoun or other word phrase, or clause which may take the place of a noun or pronoun.

Illustrations: 1. Mary plays with her doll. Mary, a proper noun, is the subject of plays. 2. He went home. He, a personal pronoun is the subject of went. 3. To give aid is a great privilege. To give aid, an infinitive phrase, is the subject of is. 4. Swimming is good exercise. Swimming, a verbal noun, is the subject of is. 5. That the man knew his business was evident to all. That the man knew his business, a noun clause, is the subject of was. 6. The wicked are punished. Wicked, an adjective, is the subject of are punished. 7. Now is the time to strike. Now, an adverb, is the subject of is.

When one noun is used to explain or to describe another noun it is said to be in Apposition with that noun; and they are always put in the same case. Illustration: Mr. Smith, the minister, has gone abroad. The noun minister describes the Mr. Smith referred to and is in the nominative case to agree with Mr. Smith, which is the subject of the sentence.

The nominative case has additional uses. The verb to be and verbs of a like nature such as seem, become, look, etc., take two nominatives, one for a subject and the other to complete their meanings. Examples: The king is a great man. Man, a nominative, completes the meaning of the copula is. She looks every inch a queen. Queen, a nominative, completes the predicate looks. A noun and an adjective or a noun and an adjective phrase or a noun and a participle, not connected with any other words in the sentence are put in the Nominative Absolute. Illustration: The bridges having been burned, the convicts were unable to escape. The bridges having been burned is the Nominative Absolute.

Other Uses of Nouns

When a noun denotes ownership it is said to be in the Possessive Case. The possessive is the only case in English denoted by a separate form. The possessive singular is formed by adding the apostrophe and s to the singular: e.g., cat, cat's; Dickens, Dickens's. The possessive plural is formed by adding apostrophe s to the plural if it does not end in s; e.g., men, men's; children, children's. If the plural form ends in s, the possessive adds only an apostrophe, e.g., dog, dogs'.

When a noun is the object of a verb, verbal, or of a preposition, it is said to be in the objective case. Illustration: John built the house. House is in the objective case because it completes the meaning and receives the action of the verb built. The man taking the picture is my uncle. Here picture is in the objective case because it completes the meaning and receives the action of the participle taking. The boy of honor will not steal. In this sentence honor is in the objective case because it is the adjunct of the preposition of.

There are some peculiar uses of the objective which should be mentioned. One is the use of the objective as the indirect object, or as the object of the preposition to, expressed, as understood.

Another peculiar use of the objective should be noted in the adverbial use of the objective case to denote time, measure, and distance. Illustration: He stayed in Rome two weeks. Two weeks is in the objective case because it denotes time. The retained object will be treated under the government of verbs.

Pronouns

Pronouns must agree in person, number and gender with the nouns for which they stand. In the sentence John lost his book, his is a personal pronoun of the third person, singular number, and masculine gender to agree with the proper noun John, for which it stands. The personal pronouns are: I, you, he, she and it.

Sometimes doubt arises as to which case of the personal pronoun one should use after parts of the verb to be. The nominative case is the correct one, although the objective is growing in common usage. Right: It is I. It is he.

The possessive case of the pronoun and also of the noun should be used before a gerund. (The gerund is a verbal noun which still retains its power of governing a noun.) Illustration: We heard of his writing a novel. In such sentences the possessive must be used, not the objective.

The relative pronouns are who, which, what and that. These pronouns have a double function, that of conjunctions and pronouns combined. As conjunctions they may be either co-ordinating or restrictive. Some writers insist that who cannot be restrictive, but others insist that it may be used either way. Which may also be either, but that is practically always restrictive. Illustrations: I wrote a check for James, who went home. This is the same as saying: I wrote a check for James and he went home. Here who is a co-ordinating conjunction. The street that you crossed is West End Avenue. That limits a particular street and is, therefore, restrictive.

Who is the only relative pronoun which has different case endings. Who is used when referring to persons, which to things, and that may be used of either person or things. A very common error is the use of the nominative case who for the objective whom and vice-versa. Illustration: The woman who (whom) I thought was honest deceived me. Who must be used instead of whom because it is the subject of was. Who (whom), did they say won? Who must be used because it is the subject of won. The man whom (who) you saw is Mr. Blank. Whom must be used because it is the object of the verb saw.

As is sometimes used as a relative pronoun and must be mentioned. It is used after same, such, so much, etc. Illustrations: Harry was working along the same lines as his father. This is equivalent to saying, Harry was working along the same lines that his father was working along.

Before leaving pronouns, the adjective pronouns must be mentioned. Each other is used when two or more than two are referred to; e.g. They fought each other for standing room. Each other may refer to any number here. One another is used when only two are referred to; e.g. John and James played with one another when they were children. Any is almost always treated as plural. Anyone is usually used for the singular. Illustrations: Are any of you going to the matinee? Has anyone a pencil? The pronoun any must not be confused with the adjective any.

Adjectives

In Old English, adjectives agreed with the noun which they modified, in number, gender and case. This agreement has long been discarded. Now the only two adjectives that agree in any way with the nouns they modify are this and that, which still retain their plural forms these and those.

Some adjectives have three degrees, the positive, the comparative, and the superlative. Examples: Good is the positive degree. It is used in speaking of one person or thing; e.g., John is a good boy. Better is the comparative degree which is used when but two things are compared; e.g., John is better than Jack. Best is the superlative degree. It is used when three or more things are compared, e.g., Of all the boys in the neighborhood, John is the best. Some adjectives are compared by adding er and est to the positive, as dark, darker, darkest; high, higher, highest. There are other adjectives which are compared by adding more and most to the positive degree: as, beautiful, more beautiful, most beautiful; cruel, more cruel, most cruel. The distributive adjectives each, every, either and neither go with the singular nouns only.

The definite article the and the indefinite articles a and an are probably used more than any other words. The is not usually repeated before each of two or more modifiers of a noun unless emphasis is desired. Illustrations: The big black cat is dead. The cat was the biggest and blackest cat I ever saw.

The is called the definite article because it points out one particular object. A and an are called indefinite because they do not point out any particular object, but limit any one of a class of things. They are sometimes repeated for emphasis before each of a series of nouns; e.g., He was a thief, a forger, and a murderer.

Verbs.

The relation of a verb to its subject has already been discussed. When a sentence has a collective noun such as mob, fleet, cavalry, crowd, or committee for a subject, that regards many units as one, syntax requires a singular verb. Illustrations: The mob is coming. The fleet is ready to sail. The committee is ready to make its report. If the subject consists of two or more singular nouns joined by or the singular verb is used. If these nouns are joined by and the plural form of the verb is used. If the subject is plural in form but singular in meaning, a singular verb is used; e.g., Thirty years is a long time to wait for a fortune.

Verbs are either transitive or intransitive. Transitive comes from the Latin word transire, which means to go over. Therefore, a transitive verb is one which requires an object to receive the action expressed and to complete its meaning. An intransitive verb does not require an object to complete its meaning. A transitive verb in the active voice governs its direct object in the objective case; e.g., John likes his dog. Dog is in the objective case because it completes the meaning of the verb and receives its expressed action. A verb is said to be in the active voice when the subject is represented as acting upon the object. The passive voice is that form of the verb which represents the subject as being acted upon; e.g., The apple was eaten by Mary. Some transitive verbs, such as giving, paying, promising, etc., govern the direct object, which is also in the objective case.

Factitive verbs, verbs of making, when active are transitive and take two objects; one the direct object and the other the second or factitive object. Some writers call the latter an object complement. An object complement is a word added to an incomplete verb to complete its meaning. If the verb is transitive, the complement often defines the action that is exerted upon the direct object. Illustration: They made him foreman. Foreman is the second object or object complement; it completes the act performed upon him.

Some transitive verbs which have two objects retain one of them when they are changed from active to passive voice. This object is called the retained object. Example: (active voice) He gave me the house· (passive voice with the retained object) I was given the house.

When two or more clauses in a sentence are dependent upon a principal verb, all the verbs must be arranged in a proper sequence of tenses to convey the true meaning of the sentence. Example: The man went home after the boy came. Went is in the past tense, so came must be in the past or past perfect tense, because that action occurred before the man went.

In simple sentences care should be taken to use the proper tenses of verbs to express the time intended to be expressed. Some common errors are the use of come for came; seen for saw; done for did; drug for dragged; and had went for had gone. A verb may govern another verb if the second verb is an infinitive. Example: We heard her sing. Sing, the infinitive, is the object of heard, with her for its subject. The subject of an infinitive is always in the objective case.

Participles, although they are adjectives, retain their verbal power of governing nouns or pronouns. Example: The girl playing the piano is my sister. Piano is governed by playing.

Adverbs

Adverbs modity verbs, adjectives, or other adverbs. Illustration: The old man walked slowly. Slowly modifies walked. The sun was very bright. Very modifies the adjective bright. The fox ran so swiftly that the dogs could not catch him. So, an adverb, modifies another adverb, swiftly. Adverbs should be placed as close as possible to the words which they modify. Some adverbs, like adjectives, have three degrees, the positive, comparative, and superlative, and are compared as adjectives are. Illustration: Mary sewed rapidly. Mary sewed more rapidly than Jane. Mary sewed most rapidly when alone.

Prepositions

Prepositions govern nouns and pronouns in the objective case. Prepositional phrases may be used as adverbs or adjectives; e.g., John went to Boston. To Boston is a prepositional phrase modifying the verb went. The Madonna of the Chair is a famous painting. Of the Chair is a prepositional phrase modifying the noun Madonna.

The following is a partial list of special prepositions which require special attention: Agree with (a person); agree to (a proposal); change for (a thing); change with (a person); differ from (a statement or opinion); differ with (a person); different from. For a complete list consult a good grammar.

Conjunctions

The main co-ordinate conjunctions, those which join clauses of equal value, are: and, also, as well as, but, or, yet, still, and the correlatives which go in pairs or groups of three, as: both—and, not only—but, neither—nor, either—or, etc. Care must be taken always to use nor with neither and or with either.

Some of the subordinate conjunctions are while, when, since, if, because, and whenever.

Syntax shows the agreement and government between the various parts of speech. The foregoing discussion is but a brief presentation of the syntax of English sentences. For a complete discussion, consult some good English grammar.

ETYMOLOGY

By CLARK S. NORTHUP, Ph.D.

Department of English, Cornell University

Definition

We shall here interpret the term etymology to mean a study of the sources of our vocabulary, the elements of words, the causes of change in the form and meaning of words, and the principles of derivation.

The Sources of Our Vocabulary

The English vocabulary has grown to great size. The number of words found in extant Old English literature does not exceed thirty thousand; Webster's New International Dictionary (1910) lists more than four hundred thousand. Most of these are of foreign origin. Of the 14,286 words listed in Skeat's Etymological Dictionary, only about four thousand are native words. Yet if we count every word on the page as often as it occurs we find that most writers use mainly English words. Shakespeare used 90 per cent; the English Bible, 94 per cent; Milton, 81 per cent; Addison, 82 per cent; Tennyson, 88 per cent. Most of our shortest and simplest words are native.

If any language comes into close contact with another, there is likelihood of word-borrowing. English is one of the most cosmopolitan of languages. From the French it began to borrow even before the Norman Conquest; after that, as intercourse with France increased, it borrowed heavily from both Norman and Parisian French. Layamon's Brut (c. 1200) has 150 words of French origin. Behrens lists some 1,250 words borrowed before 1250, of which 64 belong to religion and the church, and 28 to war and chivalry. The romance of King Alexander (before 1300) has over 760 words of French origin. Many Spanish and Italian words have also come in as a result of commercial activity.

Another large group of borrowings is from the Latin. Because of its use as the language of the church, Latin was familiar to the educated classes, and even in OE. times contributed about fifty words, including apostle, clerk, deacon, evangelist, martyr, mass, patriarch, pope, prophet, tunic. A few Latin words were borrowed from the Britons themselves (-caster, -cester, -chester, from castra, "a camp," lake, mount, mile, port, wall, -wick, wine, possibly -coln in Lincoln, street). In ME. times, because of the influence of Latin literature, more words were borrowed, many coming from the Vulgate. Latin has continued to be, down to our times, the language of men of science, in which Bacon wrote his Novum Organum, Copernicus his De Orbium Celestium Revolutionibus, and Linnæus his Systema Naturæ. It has been estimated that about four-fifths of all borrowed words in English come from French and Latin. Of Skeat's 14,286 words, about eight thousand are of Latin and Romance origin.

The number of words coming from Greek is small, though important. From the Continent the Angles brought church and devil. Down to modern times Greek words came in only through Latin. Since the Renaissance, Greek has contributed many scientific words; indeed, owing to the influence of Latin and Greek, English has nearly lost the power of coining words out of native elements. We speak not of a "sound-writer," but of a phonograph; not of a "force-measure," but a dynamometer.

Then there is a large Scandinavian element. As is well known, in the eighth and ninth centuries, Danish invaders overran northeastern England. With the gradual amalgamation of Danes and Angles came the introduction of many Danish words, e.g., bask, churn, club, skin, kill, dream, "vision," -by in place names, thwaite, thrust, tidings, tight, call, law, they, take, hit, knife. Most Danish borrowings belong to our everyday vocabulary.

A small number of words comes from Celtic sources. In OE. times were borrowed bannock, brat, brock, -comb in place names, down, "hill," dun (color), mattock, possibly rock and slough; in later times, from the Irish, bog, brogue, gallowglass, glib, "lock of hair," kern, "soldier," shamrock, shanty; from the Scotch Gaelic, cairn, claymore, clan, coronach, crag, gillie, glen, mackintosh, pibroch, slogan, Tory, whiskey; from the Welsh bragget, coracle, cromlech, crowd (musical instrument), flannel, flummery, maggot.

Etymology

From other languages we have borrowed a considerable number of words: e.g., Dutch, derrick, frolic, jerkin, mumps, plug, skipper; Persian, bazaar, divan, mogul, shawl, orange, pajamas, arsenic; Hebrew, bedlam, cherub, seraph, shekel, rabbi, camel, elephant; Arabic, alkali, emir, harem, mohair, sheik, sherbert, sofa; American Indian, hickory, hominy, moccasin, moose, skunk, toboggan. Some words from these sources are used in a religious connection; others have been derived from commerce. There is hardly a language spoken on the earth that has not contributed something to our vocabulary.

Finally, we have many hybrid words, derived from two or more sources. Macadamization is Gaelic, Hebrew, Greek, Latin, French. Cablegram is French and Greek. Linseed is Latin and English. Michaelmas is French (from Hebrew) and Latin.

The Elements of Words

In general it may be said that simple words are composed of roots (the most primitive forms of words), prefixes, and suffixes. The combination of a root with a single prefix or suffix may form a stem (e.g., stagnat- in stagnation). To the stem were attached the inflectional endings which denoted differences of case, voice, mood, and tense, e.g., respect is made up of the prefix re-, the Latin root spec, "see" and the suffix -t, which is the survival of Latin -tum. From a kindred Greek root skep, skop, we get telescope (tele, "far") and skeptic. From the root swad we get sweet, suave (Lat. suavis for suaduis), persuade, assuage. From the root kap we get have, hawk (OE. haf-oc), haven, capacious cap-ital (Lat. caput, "head"), chapter, recipe, reception, head. From the root dam, "tame," we get tame, dame, damsel, duenna, dominion, domino. From the root pak, "bind, fasten," we get pacify (Lat. pec-us, "that which is tethered up, cattle"), pecuniary "relating to cattle," which formerly served as money, fee, which in OE. meant "cattle," pact in compact, fair, fain. Skeat enumerates over 460 Indo-European roots occurring in English words.

The chief prefixes are English be- (same as by), for-, fore-, forth-, mis-, "wrongly," on-, out-, over-, twi-, "two," un-, "not," under-, with-, "against"; Lat. ab-, "from," ad-, "to," sometimes disguised as in ac-cede, af-fix, al-lude, ap-pend, ambi-, "both," ante-, "before," bi-, "double," com-, "together" (com-pound, con-tact, collision), contra- "against," de-, "down," dis-, "apart," du-, "two," ex-, "out of," extra-, "beyond," in-, "not," inter-, "between," multi-, "many," non-, ob-, "near," per-, "through," post- "after," pre-, "before," pro-, "instead of," re-, "again," retro-, "backward," semi-, "half," sub-, "under," super-, "above, over," trans-, "beyond," Greek anti-, "against," apo-, "off," arch-, auto-, "self," di-, "double," dia-, "through," epi-, "upon," hemi-, "half," hypo-, "under," meta-, "among, after," pan-, "all," para-, "beside," poly-, "many," pro-, "before," proto-, "first."

The suffixes are so numerous that we can mention only a few: English, -dom, -er, -hood, "state," -ness, -red (hat-red), -ric (bishop-ric), -ship, -th (you-th); diminutives, -ock, -ling, -kin (Per-kin, "little Peter"), -ing, patronymic (Buck-ing-ham, "home of the Buck family"); adjectival, -fast, -fold, -ful, -ish, -less, -some, -ward, -y; adverbial, -ling (dark-ling), -long, -ly, -meal, -ward, -ways, -wise; Latin, -an, -and (vi-ands), -end, -ant, -ary, -ate, -cle, -ee (refer-ee), -ion (un-ion), -tion, -ment, -or, -ory; Greek, nominal -ad, -ant, -asm, -ast, -ics, -isk, -ism, -ist, -oid, -tre (scep-tre); adjectival, -ic, -astic, -istic; verbal, -ize; French, -age, -als, -ance, -ard, -aire, -ar, -cer, -ier, -acy, -ess (larg-ess), -et, -ette, -eur, -ery, -tude, -ty; adjectival, -ese, -esque (originally diminutive), -ous; verbal, -ish, -fy, -y, (marr-y).

Changes in Form and Meaning

Our language, like every other, is in a constant state of flux or change. Words are constantly changing both form and meaning, and syntactical conceptions are constantly shifting. The growth of printing has probably retarded these processes to some extent; yet they still go on. Their progress, like that of the glacier, can be perceived only by measurements at long intervals. In OE. ham the vowel was pronounced as in father; in time, through imperceptible changes, it came to be pronounced as in law; and it is now pronounced like oa in boat. The changes in this vowel influenced and were influenced by the same vowel in other words; hence, we have the phonetic law, OE. a >

ME. aw > MnE. ō. In a similar manner other vowels have shifted since OE. times. OE. ē (as in hay) has become ee (geese); OE. i (as in eel) has become ai (while); OE. ō (as in tone) has become oo (boon); OE. u (as in fool) has become au (foul); OE. æ (as in there) has become ea (heal).

Other phenomena are due to earlier changes, some of which we will now enumerate. Grimm's Law, or the Great Consonant Shift, holds good of all the Teutonic languages. About 400 B.C. Indo-European, p, t, k became Teutonic ph, f, th, kh (cf. Latin pedem foot; Latin tres, three; Latin cornu, horn). Then all IE. ph's, th's, kh's, which had been stops (loop-hole, knot-hole, block-house), became the spirants (capable of being prolonged) f, th (thin), ch (Ger. ach). Thirdly, IE. bh, dh, gh, which had been stops, became spirants and then b, d, g (cf. Sanskirt bh*ratar*, Latin, frater, brother). Lastly, before or about 100 B.C., IE. b, d, g became Teutonic p, t, k (cf. Latin lubricus, slippery; Latin turba, thorpe; Latin, duo, two; Latin genu, knee; Latin jugum, yoke).

An exception to this law was formulated by Karl Verner in 1875 (Verner's Law). When the accent did not rest on the vowel immediately preceding the consonant in question, the medial and final voiceless spirants f, th (thin), h, s (from IE. p, t, k, s) became the voiced spirants v, th (then), g, z. This accounts for the difference between was and were; singular wæs, plural wǽsṁn, became wæzun, became wærun, became were. So comparing Greek hekaton with hundred, we see that the IE. kmtóm became first Teutonic hunth (th voiced as in then), and then hund-.

This helps us to see what an important part accent has played in language. It is accent, indeed, which has given us our series of Vowel Gradations, seen in sing, sang, sung, drive, drove, driven, bear, bore, take, took, fight, fought. Sang differs from sing because, owing to different accentuation in the original Indo-European, the vowel of the original sang-form was not pronounced with quite the same stress, and as a result became a different vowel.

In early times, too, Teutonic vowels underwent change because of a y or i sound in the next syllable. Thus, though hal became whole, haljan became hælan, now heal. The plural of mann (manniz) became menn. The plural of cū, "cow" (cūiz) became cy, and with the addition of another plural ending, kine. Thus we account for the difference between foot and feet, gold and gild, long and length, full, fill, doom, deem, food, feed, fox, vixen.

Not only do vowels change because of being near consonants; they sometimes change those consonants themselves. The vowels a, o, u are called back vowels; e, i, are front vowels and may cause a consonant to be fronted (palatalization). Thus kirk, seg, brig, flick (still heard in some parts of Britain) have become our church, sedge, bridge, flitch; and we have both seek and be-seech.

In a few words one sound has taken the place of another (substitution). We still write laugh, cough, enough, but we say læf, cawf, enuf. In Cornwall they also say thoft (thought) and broft (brought).

Moreover, there is always a tendency to cut off the ends, or to cut out parts, of words (Abbreviation). This has caused us to lose most of our inflectional endings. Teutonic drankidēdum (four syllables) has become drenched. All infinitives formerly ended in -an. Pea was formerly peas; cherry is from cheris; any is from ænig. Medial consonants have been lost from various words (Wooster from Worcester, Norfolk from Northfolk, speak from sprecan, worship from worthship, hail from hægel, fortnight from fourteen-night, England from Ænglaland, either from ægehwæther.

On the other hand a few words have gained sounds (yew, from OE. iw, newt from ewt, bridegroom from bridguma, nightingale from nihtegal, nickname from eke-name). In many words, however, a consonant added in the spelling was rarely or never pronounced (island, debt, corps).

One of the most powerful influences at work upon words is Analogy. We all like to have regularity in language as in other things, and our minds tend to put words into groups. On the analogy of kingdom we made dukedom, Christendom. OE. rihtwis has become righteous on the analogy of words like gracious, vicious. Two persons can be friends; so we sometimes hear, "I'll be friends with him." On the analogy of lemonade we have orangeade. The folk mind sometimes makes mistakes which lead to curious changes (Folk-Etymologies). Asparagus becomes sparrow-grass; Old French pick-ois becomes pick-ax. Jerked beef has nothing to do with jerking, but is connected with Peruvian charqui, "dried meat." Rothschild, "red shield," has come to be pronounced as if it were Roth's-child. Shamefaced was formerly shamefast. Penthouse is not really related to either pent or house (formerly pentus from French pentis). In admiral there is confusion of Arabic amir al bahr, "commander of the sea," with Latin admirari, "admire."

Likewise words are constantly shifting in meaning. These changes may be grouped roughly as follows:

Generalization of meaning. Circumstances, formerly "the things that surround us," now means "conditions over us" ("under these circumstances"). Virtue, formerly "manliness," now has various meanings, which the context helps to decide. Fire as a verb is more general than its noun equivalent.

Specialization. Meat, once "food," now means only "flesh." Disease formerly "discomfort," is now confined to sickness. Minister formerly meant any kind of "servant." Undertaker was once "a contractor" in general.

Division. Many words have split into two or more. Latin persona, "mask," has given us parson in the ecclesiastical sense and person in the sense of "human being." Latin ex-agium has yielded both assay and essay. Head has widely different meanings.

Transference of meaning. Bead originally meant "prayer"; as perforated balls on a string were used to count prayers, they gradually took on the word for prayers themselves. Exchequer, originally "a chess-board," has come to mean "a national banking account." Moustache originally meant "the face between the end of the nose and the upper lip." Quaint, formerly "wise, skilful," now means "fanciful, odd, old-fashioned." Game in the hunter's language means not "sport," but the result of it—what is taken.

Degeneration. Villain formerly meant merely "a slave attached to a country estate (villa); later it meant "a farm laborer." Caitiff formerly meant "captive." Counterfeit formerly meant simply "to copy."

Euphemism. The desire to speak decently concerning subjects which one is loath or afraid to mention specifically leads us to use many words in senses different from the original. Disliking to say died, we substitute passed away, fell asleep, breathed his last. Trowsers is found better than breeches or pants. One who steals large sums is often called an embezzler. We perspire rather than sweat. Disliking to swear, we get around it by saying Gee! Jerusalem! golly!

Slang is also an important feeder of language. Graft, originally "a twig attached to a branch," has now come into good use for "illegitimate income." Off one's base, borrowed from baseball language, is often used to describe one who expresses a wrong opinion. To freeze out, to give one the cold shoulder, are by many preferred to treat coldly.

The Principles of Derivation

From these illustrations we get some notion of how language has grown and continues to grow. The etymologist must bear all these processes in mind. In tracing the history of words one should observe the following canons, based on those of Skeat:

1. Ascertain the earliest form and use of the word; observe chronology.
2. Observe history and geography. Borrowings are due to actual contact.
3. Observe phonetic law strictly. This is of fundamental importance.
4. Account for the whole of a word, not merely a part.
5. Disregard resemblances of form or even connection in sense between words in languages which have different phonetic laws or no necessary connection.
6. No explanation of a word is valid which will not account also for all its cognate forms.

PUNCTUATION

By MORRIS W. CROLL, Ph.D.

DEPARTMENT OF ENGLISH, PRINCETON UNIVERSITY

The number of punctuation marks in common use has gradually increased during the last five hundred years, because the art of representing the meaning of discourse to the eye of the reader has been made more important by the invention of printing and the great increase in the number of persons who can read. Originally the period was the only mark used, and from this single sign all the others were made by slight changes in its form. At least this is the commoner theory as to their origin.

The comma came first, which was made by adding a downward stroke to the period. Then the need was felt for a mark which should show a pause longer than that indicated by the comma, yet shorter than that marked by the period. Hence, the modern use of the semi-colon, which is a period above a comma. But still a longer pause sometimes occurs within the sentence: the colon, or two periods, serves to mark it. Even the question-mark was originally only a period with an inverted comma above it, that is, it was an inverted semi-colon, and from this the present form of the sign was evolved.

Still the number of marks is comparatively small. There are only twelve in common use, though this number could be increased by counting certain printers' signs rarely used in writing. And of these twelve there are only four or five which it is difficult to use intelligently and well. Indeed the comma is the only one that is very generally misused. For those who find themselves in a state of confusion or uncertainty concerning the uses of this important mark, it will be well to lay down the rule that the comma is not to be used unless there is good reason for it. The purpose of it, as of all marks, is to make the meaning as clear as possible to the eye, and in a case of doubt it is a good plan to omit the comma unless it serves this purpose.

However there are certain uses of all the points which are recognized as standard and regular, are found in all good books (with some variations, it is true), and must be learned by one who wishes to write not only clearly, but also according to the customs of his language and his time. The more important of these uses are described in the following rules, and the observance of them will remove most of the difficulties that arise in ordinary practice. But it must be remembered that punctuation is only a part of the whole art of expression; if the style is loose and familiar, punctuation must be of one kind; in exact and formal writing it will be of another; and a violation of the laws of speech may involve one in difficulties of punctuation which cannot be overcome.

The twelve marks are as follows: Period (.), comma (,), semi-colon (;), colon (:), question-mark (?), exclamation-point (!), apostrophe ('), quotation-mark, single (' '), and double (" "), dash (—), hyphen (-), parentheses (( )), brackets ([ ]).

The Period

The period is used (1) to indicate the end of a sentence, and (2) after abbreviations; as, Mr., P.O., T.B. Macaulay, A.M.

The Comma

The comma is used within a sentence to mark certain pauses or changes of vocal expression which would occur if the words were spoken aloud. The principal cases where it regularly occurs are the following:

1. Between the members of a series of words or phrases which are not connected by conjunctions, as Lawyers, doctors, clergy, all agree on this point. When and occurs before the last member of such a series, present usage favors the use of the comma there also, as Lawyers, doctors, and clergy all agree on this point.

2. To mark off words or phrases of different address from the rest of the sentence; as:—Friends, listen to me; I repeat, John, what I have often said.

3. After an exclamatory word or phrase at the beginning of a sentence, when no particular emphasis is to be put upon it in utterance; as:—No, we cannot go; Well, we shall see. (Of course, when emphasis is desired, the exclamation point is used.)

4. Before quotations not more than one sentence long; as: — I asked, "Where shall we stay tonight?"

5. To mark off words which are parenthetical in their nature, that is to say, such as interrupt the forward movement of the sentence; as:—

How many men, the pessimist observes, do not speak as they think.

Woodrow Wilson, late President of the United States, died in 1924.

Cotton goods, the most valuable of all our lines, are advancing in price.

7. To mark off non-restrictive relative clauses. This is an important rule, which needs some explanation. A relative clause (that is, a clause which is introduced by a relative pronoun, who, which, what, or a relative adverb, such as whereby, whereon) may serve to restrict or define the noun or pronoun that it goes with, or, in other words, tell exactly which one of a number of persons or things one is speaking of, and in that case it is not separated from the noun or pronoun by a comma, as The man whom we saw down town was wearing a new overcoat. (Here the clause is necessary, for it tells what man we are speaking of.) But, on the other hand, the clause may not be restrictive, but only descriptive or informative, adding some fact or observation concerning a person or thing already clearly defined. In this case the clause must be set off by commas, as John Jones, whom we met down town, was wearing a new overcoat. (Here the clause is not necessary to the sense, but is a voluntary addition by the author.)

8. Sometimes at the end of a long or complicated clause, merely to indicate that a rest or breathing-space is needed. But the general rule laid down at the beginning, that a comma should not be used unless it is necessary for clearness, may well be followed in this case

The Semi-colon

1. The general rule for the semi-colon is that it separates clauses less closely knit together in syntax and thought than those separated by the comma; as:—

The amount of our order must depend upon the probable state of trade; and of this we shall be better able to judge after the holidays.

In the city men work and play; in the country they live.

2. As the comma is used to separate words and phrases used in series (see Rule 1 under "The Comma"), so the semi-colon is used to separate clauses in series. The last of such a series of clauses often begins with and, but there also the semi-colon should be used; as:—Most men accept the ideas of the majority party; some follow the opinions of chosen leaders; and only a few think for themselves.

3. Clauses beginning with certain conjunctions are more freely marked off with semi-colons than others. These are for, so, and so, therefore, etc.

4. In a long and comprehensive sentence, it is necessary sometimes to use the semi-colon to separate a large inclusive division of the sentence containing smaller subdivisions; as:—Now, as the night begins to deepen, we will leave you and seek the moor; but to-morrow morning, at the first fall of dew, we will again find out the dwellings of men.

5. Sometimes after an exclamatory word, such as No, Yes, Come, a semi-colon is used to indicate a longer pause or a different expression of the voice than that indicated by the comma.

The Colon

The colon is used:—

1. Before a list of particulars or items; as:—

We have made several statements to your firm: first, that . . . ; secondly, that . . . ; [etc].

The reasons are the following: [etc.].

2. To introduce a quotation, especially one that is more than a sentence in length; as:—She said in reply: "I will tell you the whole story."

3. After a salutation in a letter; as:—Messrs. J. H. Gideon and Company, Gentlemen: [etc.].

4. The dash may be used with the colon in all the above cases, especially when that which follows is written as a separate paragraph. Many examples of this will be observed in the present discussion.

The Question-Mark

The question-mark is used:—

1. At the end of a question, as Is he here? If, however, the question is put indirectly (that is, not in the exact words of the speaker), no question-mark is used, as He asks what we are now to do.

2. To suggest doubt as to the correctness of a word or statement, or to indicate a suggested correction; as:—

There are said to be 30 (?) hogsheads.

He reports that ten (?eleven) cases are still to arrive.

The Exclamation-Point

The exclamation-point is used to indicate a sense of wonder or intense feeling, as What a catastrophe it was!

The Apostrophe

The apostrophe is used:—

1. To indicate the possessive case, singular and plural, of nouns. (a) The rule for the singular number is to place the apostrophe before the letter s, which is the sign of the possessive, as man's, horse's. If, however, the noun is a proper name and ends in s, we may either write the possessive in the usual way, as just described, or we may omit the regular possessive ending s and indicate the possessive by merely placing the apostrophe after the final s of the word, as Dickens' works, or Dickens's works. (b) If the plural of a noun is formed in the usual way, by adding s or es (or x, as in some nouns from the French), the possessive plural is formed by adding an apostrophe after the s, as boys' books; asses' milk; the beaux' stratagem. But if the plural is formed without s or es, the possessive plural is indicated by adding an apostrophe and s, as in the singular, as men's clothes; women's wraps. Note.—The apostrophe is never used in the possessive case of pronouns, as its, theirs, whose.

2. In writing the plural of figures, signs, letters, and the like; as: Cross your t's and dot your i's; the 6's should be written in a column.

3. To show that letters are omitted in contracted forms of words, as doesn't, isn't, gov't. Note—It is wrong to use the apostrophe to indicate the plural of proper names, as The Joneses, not the Jones's.

The Quotation-Mark

1. The double quotation-mark is used at the beginning and at the end of a direct quotation; as: I heard him say: "How many trains run on Sunday?"

2. The single quotation mark is used at the beginning and at the end of a quotation within a quotation; as:—

In the course of his speech he said: "I will now read my opponent's words. In a Nashville newspaper he declared, on October 5th, 1913, 'I will not accept office in any circumstances.' I need make no comment."

3. When the main quotation and the quotation within it end at the same place, both the single and the double quotation-mark must be used at the end, thus ' ".

The Dash

1. The dash is used to indicate a sudden interruption of what is being said, or a violent break in the construction of a sentence; as: What would have happened to us—but I can't bear to think of the possibility.

2. Sometimes the dash is used to indicate a parenthetical statement, but ordinarily the parenthesis, or even the comma, will serve the purpose better. And, in general, the dash should not be used to take the place of other marks.

The Hyphen

1. The hyphen is used between the parts of a compound word, as to-day, to-morrow, twenty-three, frost-bitten.

2. At the end of a line to indicate that a word begun is to be finished at the beginning of the next line. The rule with regard to such division is that the part carried over to the following line should constitute a complete syllable (or more than one syllable); that is, a syllable should not be broken in the middle, as propo-sal, not propos-al; sim-ple, not simp-le.

Parentheses

Parentheses are used to mark off words thrown into the midst of a sentence, but not regarded as a part of it; as: Please meet me (I will let you know the time later) at the Grand Central Station.

Brackets

Brackets are used to mark off words thrown in by the writer or speaker while he is quoting the words of another; as:—

The writer continues as follows: "In the year preceding [that is, twenty-six years before the present date] nothing had happened."

CAPITALIZATION

Capital letters should be used:

1. At the beginning of a sentence, and at the beginning of a quotation within a sentence. A direct question put in the midst of a sentence should also begin with a capital letter, even when it is not quoted from another speaker; as: I ask you, What are we to do?

2. In so-called proper names, that is, names formally given to a particular person or thing, such as the names of persons, corporations, cities, mountains, buildings, countries, etc., as Napoleon, The Vesuvius Life Insurance Company, New Brunswick, City Hall, etc.

3. In adjectives derived from proper names, as English, Napoleonic, Democratic. Sometimes adjectives which are parts of proper names are not derived from nouns; they must also be capitalized; as: Episcopal Church.

4. Names of the Deity and of sacred objects associated with the Deity. Pronouns referring to the Deity are also usually capitalized. As: The Bible, the Cross, hallowed be Thy name.

5. Titles when they are used as naming the particular persons that are bearing them; as: He wrote to the President; King Albert. But when they are used without being meant to name a particular person they are not capitalized; as: A president may be as powerful as a king; the presidents of companies are usually elected.

6. In the names of the days of the week and the names of the months, as Wednesday, July. The names of the seasons are not capitalized.

7. In titles of books, stories, magazines, etc., as Twelfth Night, The Gentle Boy. But small and unimportant words in such titles are not capitalized as A Trip to the Moon.

DICTIONARY OF BASKETBALL TERMS

scofflaw, one who ignores the prohibition amendment.
scratched ticket, in politics, a ticket on which certain names are erased and others substituted.
shack, slight wooden shed or shelter.
shake, to leave a person, place, or thing.
shower, simultaneous gifts of various articles to a person by friends to mark an event, such as a birthday, recovery from sickness, or marriage engagement.
skedaddle, to run away.
sleigh, same as English "sledge."
slip, an open space between two wharves or in a dock.
small potatoes, a thing or person small, mean, or of little account.
smile, to take a drink.
smudge, a smoky fire to drive away insects.
soured, of a person, one become dissatisfied with a condition.
span, pair of horses.
squatter, one who settles or squats on land without legally acquiring it.
squeal, to inform against.
squeeze, to force loss in the stock market.
stakes, pull up, to remove.
stall, to stick fast, as "train stalled by snow."
stampede, sudden flight of crowd.
stand-patter, in politics, one who sticks to his party under all circumstances.
stiff, a corpse.
stoop, door steps.
store, same as English "shop."
straight, of drinks, without water; same as English "neat." straight ticket, in politics, a ticket voted without change.
street car, horse or electric, same as English "tram-car."

strike oil, to become rich suddenly.
stump, on the, one who travels from place to place making political speeches.
suspenders, same as English "braces."
swat, to strike.
swipe, to steal.
switch, on railroads, same as English "shunt."

tanglefoot, liquor.
tavern, place for entertainment and lodging of travelers; in England, place for entertainment only.
tenderfoot, a newcomer in a mining or ranching region.
ten-strike, a fortunate stroke, hit, or transaction.
ticker, a watch.
tote, to carry.
trolley, a surface car; English, tram.
truck, small fruits and vegetables.
trust, combination of business interests, illegal where in restraint of trade or competition.
turn down, same as freeze out.

U

up in the air, of a person, getting overexcited.

vamose, to disappear. vendue, an auction.

W

whoop it up, to create enthusiasm or excitement.
wilt, to lose energy or interest.
wind-bag, boaster.
wire-puller, one who seeks an advantage by favor of others.

DICTIONARY OF THE AUTOMOBILE

accelerator, the pedal used for quickening the speed of a car.

accumulator. See storage battery.

advanced spark, adjustment of the spark between the jump and the attainment of the full pressure of the charge.

afterfire, the explosion of an accumulation of unburnt gas in the muffler, caused by misfires in one or more cylinders; makes a loud and somewhat startling report.

air cooling, cooling the engine by aid of the fan.

ammeter, an instrument which indicates whether the battery is charging or discharging, and at what rate.

armature, the rotating part of a motor.

artillery wheel, a heavy wooden wheel with steel hub.

back fire, the ignition of the charge in the motor cylinder prematurely causing the motion of the engine to stop or reverse.

back kick, a more or less violent kick of the crank handle when a back fire occurs while the crank is in hand.

barking. See afterfire.

bearings, the smooth, fitted hole in which a shaft turns.

beval gear, a gear in which the teeth are cut straight across the beveled edge.

bonnet, the metallic covering for the motor.

brake, a device for slackening the speed of the car; operated both by hand and by foot. See emergency-brake, service-brake.

break, a low-tension spark.

brushes, steel, brass or copper springs held against the center of a revolving part to carry the current from the stationary part.

bushings, short tubes, usually with rims or flanges to hold them in place. It provides a wearing surface for the bearings.

cable, the insulated wire or wires that conveys the electrical energy to the spark plug.

cantilever spring, a single spring with one end shackled to the end of the car and the other attached to the rear axle housing.

carburetter, apparatus for mixing gasoline and air for fuel.

chain, the links that convey power from one sprocket wheel to another.

charge, the mixture of gas and air in a cylinder.

chassis, the frame, including the power apparatus and the running and steering gears.

chauffeur, another name for the driver.

circuit breaker, a device which prevents excessive charging of the storage battery.

clearance, another name for the combustion chamber.

clutch cone, a short section of the cone of large diameter fitting into a recess of the same form and pressed into place by a spring.

clutch discs, a series of discs, half of which are attached to flying members attached to the fly wheel, and the other half to the shaft which transmits power to the gear set.

combustion chamber, the same as the clearance space in a steam engine cylinder.

commutator, an instrument which sends the low tension current into the coil.

compensating-gear, a gear that enables the rear wheels to rotate at different speeds, in turning.

condenser, strips of folded tinfoil insulated from each other with oiled paper. It absorbs and distributes high tension current and prevents excessive sparking at contact points.

contact breaker, a device that keeps the circuit closed excepting at the moment of the spark.

contact maker, a device that breaks the circuit at the moment of the spark.

control levers, levers mounted on the frame on the driver's side and on the steering wheel.

cooling, reducing the heat of the cylinder by means of water passing through jackets or by air circulating through radiating flanges.

cranking, turning the crank handle quickly by hand to start the engine rotating.

crypto-gear, another name for planetary-gear.

current, power produced from a chemical battery or small dynamo.

cylinder, the mechanism in which the piston works and the explosions occur.

dark-colored smoke, in the exhaust, indicates a too rich mixture of gas which takes fire imperfectly.

dead-axle, a non-rotating rear axle.

dead center, the point where the crank is incapable of imparting motion either forward or backward.

dense-white smoke, in the exhaust, indicates a poor oil, an excess of cylinder oil, or a deposit of soot in the cylinder.

differential gear, another name for compensating-gear.

direct drive, where power is applied direct instead of by gears.

drive final, the drive from the propeller shaft to the rear axle.

drum brake, the drum upon which the brake band is wound or is contained.

duplex carburetters, consist of two sets of nozzles and mixing tenders combined in one instrument and fed by a common throat feed chamber.

Dutchman, a small screw sticking part way into the housing and part way into the bushing. It prevents the latter from turning.

electrolyte, a chemical solution used in voltaic cells. It consists of two parts sulphuric acid added to five or seven parts water.

emergency-brake, a device for a sudden slackening of speed or stoppage of car, operated by a hand lever.

engine, the combustion apparatus; operated with gas and with liquid fuel.

exhaust manifold, the tube that conveys the burnt gas to the muffler.

exhaust valve, that by which the burnt gases pass out of the engine; operated mechanically; opened at every alternate upward stroke of the piston by means of a cam.

fan, a device mounted on adequate bearings which, by swiftly rotating, cools the engine by forcing the air against it.

feed port, an opening for the admission of steam or gas.

flash boiler, a compact type of steam generator.

float carburetter, another name for gravity carburetter.

floating axle, one in which the wheel is mounted on the housing. It is made with a flange or spider, which has teeth interlocking in the hubs of the wheel.

foot pedals, apparatus used with or without the control levers to control the motion of the car when running.

friction clutch, that which connects the engine with the first shaft.

frozen-carburetter, to be avoided by jacketing, heating the air supply, or warming the carburetter and admission pipe with boiling water.

fuel, in non-electric cars, a mixture of gasoline and air.

fuses, short strips or wires of a metal which easily melts, inserted in the various circuits, for the protection of the lamps, windings and other parts.

G

garage, a place for housing or repairing a car.

gas, the mixture of gasoline and air.

gasoline-electric car, a car in which the change-speed gear and its connections are replaced by a dynamo driven by the engine, and the electrical energy generated is utilized in operating one or more electric motors, which in turn propel the car.

gasoline fire, best extinguished by sand or a dry chemical; also by a moist blanket; a stream of water should never be used as it spreads the fire.

generator, a motor driven by a chain or gearing.

gravity carburetter, a carburetter which atomizes the fuel through a small nozzle and mixes it with a current of air.

ground circuit, the return of the current to its source by means of the metal of the engine.

H

high tension current, current which is generated in the secondary coil by interruption of the primary current, or by the rapid magnetization and demagnetization of the core and primary coil.

Hotchkiss drive, an arrangement of the propeller shaft by which the rear axle pulls the car along by the springs.

ignition, lighting of the fuel by an electric spark.

inlet valves, valves by means of which the explosive mixture is admitted to the combustion chamber of the engine; one kind is opened automatically by the motor itself on its suction stroke; another is operated mechanically.

inner lever, the lever that shifts the transmission-gear.

in step, valves are said to be "in step" with each other when all of them are operated by the same cam shaft.

insulation, the covering of the conductor with a non-conducting substance to prevent the spark from jumping or seeking the ground.

intake manifold, the tube that convey the gas from the carburetter to the cylinder.

interrupter, a contact breaker on a magneto.

jackets, apparatus on the cylinder walls through which water circulates for cooling the cylinder.

jack-in-the-box, another name for compensating-gear.

journal, the part of the shaft which turns in the bearing.

jump, a high-tension spark.

K

knocking, sounds caused by worn bearings.

live-axle, an axle that rotates with the wheels. See dead-axle.

low tension current, current which is generated in the primary winding or coil by placing it in the magnetic field.

lubrication, small gasoline motors are usually lubricated on the splash system, a charge of oil being caused to flow into the crank chamber about every 20 miles travelled; in large cars the lubrication of the engine and of the different bearings of the car is effected mechanically; bearings that do not require frequent attention are filled with grease lubricators.

magneto, in principle, the same as dynamo.

manifold, the tube that transmits the gas, steam, air, or water.

misfire, the skipping of one or more cylinders when the motor is firing gases.

mixer, another name for carburetter.

mixing chamber, small enclosure containing a nipple or nozzle through which the gasoline is sucked, partly by the engine, and partly by the stream of air with which it is mingled by being sprayed against a cone.

motor, the machine for transforming the electric current into mechanical energy; placed in the forepart of the frame with its crank shaft at right angles to the axles of the road wheels, and with its flywheel on the rear end of the shaft.

muffler, an apparatus for reducing the velocity of the exhaust gases, thereby reducing the noise; consists of a cylinder and a pipe, the latter full of small holes, permitting the admission of the exhaust at high pressure and its weakened release into the atmosphere.

multiplex-cylinder engine, an engine using several small cylinders instead of a large single one.

needle valve, a valve in the carburetter which regulates the flow of gasoline.

non-skids, chains, knobs, and other projections on tires to prevent slipping.

one horse power, 33,000 foot pounds of work done in one minute.

one wire system, a lighting system in which the return current to the battery is grounded.

outer lever, the lever that operates the emergency brake.

piston, a metallic device in the cylinder that receives the force of the explosions and conveys it to the crank shaft.

planetary-gear, a means of transmission by the use of a clutch and an enclosed system of gear wheels.

pneumatic tires, hollow rubber tires whose elasticity absorbs shocks on uneven roads.

poor mixture, the explosive mixture in which air predominates.

pre-ignition, the premature ignition of the explosive mixture.

radiator, tubing for cooling cylinders with water.

retarded spark, a delay of the spark to accommodate delay in combustion.

reversing-gear, gear arranged for altering the direction of road-wheels.

rich mixture, the explosive mixture in which gas predominates.

running-gear, springs, axles, wheels, and steering-gear.

safety gap, a pair of points in the magneto which prevent the current jumping when the magneto is working.

semi-floating axle, one in which the live shaft is carried straight out from the hub with the road wheel to which it is keyed fast.

service-break, a device for slackening the speed of a car; operated by a foot-pedal and released by a spring when the foot is removed.

shock-absorber, an apparatus for reducing shocks when driving over an uneven road.

short circuit, a defect in insulation allowing the current to leak.

skidding, the sliding of a car off of its course.

smoke. See dark-colored smoke; dense-white smoke; thin-blue smoke.

smoky exhaust, escaping burnt gases; also the smoldering of soot in a cylinder, causing pre-ignition.

spark, the electric spark that jumps across the terminals of the spark plug when the piston reaches the end of its first return or compression stroke.

spark-gap, the space between the two electrodes or points of the spark plug.

spark plug, a plug that regulates the sparks.

sprayer carburetter, another name for gravity carburetter.

spur-gears, gears for changing speed.

steering-post, the post to which is attached the steering wheel, the spark regulating handle, and the carburetter throttle; set obliquely toward the driver.

storage battery, a chemical means of producing electricity for ignition.

stroke, the distance the piston passes each way.

stud-steering axle, the front axle on which the steering wheels are hinged.

surface carburetter, a carburetter in which air is sucked from the engine over a surface moistened with liquid spirit.

synchronous vibration, vibration in the parts of the car which have the same period as the vibration of the engine.

tank, the container of the fuel.

tappet valve, a valve which has only one adjustment, called the tappet.

thermostat, the base of the automatic temperature regulator, which is a small, bottle-like affair containing a liquid very sensitive to temperature changes.

thin-blue smoke, in the exhaust indicates an accurate mixture of the gas and a proper ignition.

throttle, the admission valve interposed between a carburetter and the inlet valve pipe, so that the driver can vary the amount of mixture, or gas, passing to the engine.

throttle valve, a valve which controls the flow of the mixture of the engine after it has been formed in the carburetter.

timer, the revolving switch which opens and closes the primary circuit.

tonneau, a car with front seats for two persons and a rear one for several.

transmission, that part of the mechanism between the engine and the road wheels; it transmits the high speed power to the low speed road wheels.

trembler, a contact maker which makes several rapid contacts for each ignition; it is the vibrating spring blade on an induction coil, which interrupts the primary current during the time the contact is made in the commutator.

tubular radiator, a radiator with a small tank or header at the top into which the hot water from the engine flows, and another at the bottom from which it flows back into the engine. It has a series of vertical tubes connecting the two tanks.

two wire lighting system, a system in which both sides of the circuit are wired.

underslung, a car in which the frame is below the axles.

vacuum tank, a pump which obtains gasoline from the main tank and delivers it to the small tank below the pump.

valve, the apparatus which regulates the flow of mixture or gas by opening or closing its passage-way.

valve-chamber, the part of the combustion chamber which forms a pocket above the valve.

valve-face, the seating on which the valve closes.

valve-gear, of the engine; its entire mechanism.

valve, exhaust, the one through which the burnt gas passes outward.

valve, inlet, the valve through which the gas is admitted.

venturi tube, a tube constricted or made smaller in diameter near the point where the gasoline is drawn from the spray jet.

vibrator coil, a device for giving a series of sparks instead of one for each ignition.

water-cooled engine, one in which the cylinders are surrounded by an outer casing. The space is filled with water which cools the engine.

water-jacket. See jackets.

wheel-base, the amount of distance between the centers of the back and front wheels.

wheel-track, the amount of distance between the paths of the front wheels.

worm bevel, one in which the teeth are cut at an angle across the face of the gear.

worm-gearing, that on which the teeth of the worm wheels are of a spiral character, and transmit the power into sliding thrust.

DICTIONARY OF AVIATION

advancing edge, the front edge of plane. See following edge.

aerial transportation, a system of dirigible travel, inaugurated by Count Zeppelin, of Germany, with an elongated cylindrical airship 420 feet long and 39 feet in diameter. He made some remarkable voyages, but lost a number of airships through a variety of disasters.

aerodrome, a race-course for flying machines; also, a hangar.

aerofoil, a structure wing-like in form, with flat or curved surface, designed for the purpose of obtaining reaction upon its surface from the air through which it moves.

aeronaut, strictly, one who pursues the science of ballooning.

aeronautics, the construction and operation of flying machines, of the lighter-than-air type.

aeroplane, a flying machine of the heavier-than-air type, with one or more surfaces sufficient to support the weight of passengers.

aerostat, technical name for the machine or apparatus.

aerostatics, technical name for the science of mechanical aviation.

aerostation, the same as aeronautics.

ailerons, subsidiary horizontal planes set parallel to and between the main planes, capable of independent operation, and used for maintaining a horizontal equilibrium.

aircraft, a name given to any form of craft designed for navigating the air.

airplane. See aeroplane.

air-speed meter, an instrument designed for measuring the speed of aircraft in relation with the air.

alighting gear, the under-mechanism of an aeroplane, for lessening the impact on reaching the ground.

altimeter, an aneroid fixed on the aircraft for the purpose of indicating its height above the surface of the earth.

anemometer, a name given to any instrument used for measuring the velocity of the wind.

angle of incidence, the angle of inclination of the supporting plane to the line of flight.

appendix, the name given to hose at the bottom of the balloon used for inflation. It also serves in the case of a spherical balloon for equalization of pressure.

arch, the down curve on the end of a plane.

ascent. See initial ascent.

aspect, the upper view of the plane surface.

aspect-ratio, the proportion of the length to the width of a plane surface.

aviation, the science of the mechanical flight in heavier-than-air constructions.

aviator, strictly, one who pursues the science of aviation, or flying.

aviatrix, (ā'vi-a-trix), n. a woman aviator.

axes, three established lines of reference mutually rectangular and in most cases centroidal.

balancing flaps. See aileron.

balancing surface, any surface that may be used in steering or maintaining even balance.

ballast, bags of sand usually attached to the car of a balloon to lighten it for more upward flight by being thrown out.

ballonets, small auxiliary balloons, elongated or conical in shape, attached to the end of the main gas bag of a balloon for greater stability.

balloon, a lighter-than-air spherical or elongated bag of silk or other material, inflated with gas; the original type of a flying machine.

balloon bed, mooring place for a captive balloon.

bank, the action of inclining an aeroplane laterally.

barograph, an instrument for recording variations in barometric pressure. In flying, the charts indicate altitudes instead of barometric pressure.

barrage balloon, a small, captive balloon used as a protection in war against attacks by aeroplanes.

basket, in a balloon, the car which hangs beneath for passengers, etc.

biplane, a machine with two planes or wings, one set above the other.

blimp, a small, non-rigid balloon, in which the shape of the gas bag is preserved by means of an interior ballonet.

body, that part of a machine which contains the motor, fuel, and passengers.

bonnet, an appliance which protects the valve of a balloon against rain.

bridle, the name given to the attachment of a cable to a balloon.

bulls-eyes, small wooden or metal rings used for the connection or adjustment of ropes in the rigging of a balloon.

cabane, a framework on the wing of an aircraft to which are secured the stays, etc.
camber, extreme depth of curvature on an aeroplane wing.
capacity, the cubic contents of a balloon.
captive balloon, a balloon which is held to the earth by a cable.
car, the apparatus suspended from a balloon by ropes, in which the operator sits and to which are attached the bags of sand or ballast used to lighten the balloon when necessary by being thrown out. cells. See partitions.
center of gravity, the point where the machine balances in all directions.
center of pressure, the line along which the air acts to elevate the planes; just forward of the center of gravity.
center of thrust, the point where the propulsive thrust of one or more propellers is balanced.
chord, in the aerofoil section the right line tangent at the front and rear to the under curve. The length of the chord is the length of the projection of the aerofoil section on the chord.
clinometer, see inclinometer.
compression side, the side of a plane or propeller-blade that acts against the air.
concentration ring, a hoop from which hang the ropes suspending the basket on a balloon.
control column, the lever by which certain of the chief controls are operated . . . usually those for preventing pitching and rolling.
controls, the general term given to the means for operating the speed, direction and altitude controls of an aircraft.
crow's foot, a system of short ropes for distributing the pull of a single rope.

decalage, the name given to the angle between the chords of the chief planes in monoplanes.
demountable, a kind of mechanism that can be readily taken apart and reassembled.
dihedral, pairs of wings inclined upward to each other.
dirigible, or dirigible balloon, a balloon of the lighter-than-air type, so constructed that it may be made to travel in any desired direction; operated by a propeller driven by a motor; fashioned in cigar, conical, and cylindrical shapes; some over 600 feet in length; with long passenger and operating car suspended from the gas bag.
dirigible, non-rigid, a type of dirigible in which the gas contained in its body maintains its form.
dirigible, rigid, a dirigible in which the form is maintained by a rigid structure within the envelope.
dirigible, semi-rigid, a dirigible in which the form is maintained by a rigid keep and by gas pressure combined.
diving rudder. See elevator.
dope, a term used to indicate the material used to treat the cloth surface in aeroplanes and balloons.
double monoplane, monoplane with two sustaining surfaces, one ahead of the other.
double surfaced, wings with surfaces above and below the ribs, wing bars, etc. drag, the component which is parallel to the relative wind of the total force on an aircraft due to the air through which it moves.
drift. Same as drag.
drift meter, an instrument used for measuring the angular deviation of an aircraft from a set course.

edge, one of the ends of a plane.
elevator, a horizontally-placed rudder for vertical steering.
empennage. See tail.
engine, the mechanism that gives speed and power with minimum weight.
entering edge, the name given to the foremost edge of an aerofoil or propeller blade.
envelope, the name of that part of the balloon or dirigible in which the gas is contained.
equator, the name given to the largest circumference of a spherical balloon.

feathering, a device for securing stability in a dirigible, consists of attaching four rigid planes, arranged like a cross, at the rear of the gas bag.
fin, a single fixed plane for increasing the stability of a dirigible.
fire balloon, popular designation of the Montgolfier balloon.
flapping flight, one occasioned by a rapid reciprocation of sustaining surfaces.
flight path, the path taken by the center of gravity in an aircraft, with reference to the earth.
float, that part of the landing gear of an aircraft by which buoyancy is provided when the craft rests on the surface of the water.

flying machine, a construction for aerial flight and travel, heavier-than-air, as distinguished from a balloon, classed as lighter-than-air.

following edge, the rear edge of a plane. See advancing edge.

fuselage, the frame work of a machine.

gap, the shortest distance between the planes of the chords of the upper and lower wings of a biplane.

gas bag. See envelope.

glide, flight without using the power of the engine.

glider, an aeroplane which is without power.

gliding, a powerless flight down a slant.

gliding angle, the angle made by the path of flight with the horizontal when flying in still air without power from the engine.

gore, the name given to one of the segments of the fabric of which the envelope is composed.

guide rope, a long rope attached to a dirigible or spherical balloon, serving both as a brake and as ballast.

guy, a rope, rod or chain attached to an aircraft to steady and guide it.

gyroplane, a combination of aeroplane and helicopter.

gyroscope, an instrument used to give steadiness to a flying machine.

hangar, a shed for housing a flying machine.

heavier-than-air, applied to flying machines that weigh more than the air they displace.

helicopter, a flying machine which ascends from power derived from the vertical thrust of propellers.

helicord propellers, two propellers fitted to a helicopter and rotating in opposite directions.

horizontal rudder, a rudder set horizontally for vertical steering.

hydroaeroplane, an aeroplane that can rise from water after alighting thereon.

inclinometer, an instrument used for measuring the angle between any axis of an aircraft and the horizontal.

initial ascent, the elevation from the ground; acquired by the rotation of the propellers; aided by wheels on which the machine runs along the ground or by runners sliding along an inclined plane, till the propellers have gained sufficient speed to lift the machine into the air.

kite balloon, a form of captive balloon which is fitted with appendages to keep it headed into the wind.

landing gear, the underpart of the aircraft designed to carry the load when the craft runs or rests on the surface of the land or water.

landing-wheels, wheels on the chassis that take up the first shock on alighting.

lateral stability, stability in a side-to-side direction.

leading edge. See entering edge.

leeway, the deviation from a set course over the earth, caused by cross currents. It is also called drift.

lift, in a vertical plane, the component perpendicular to the relative wind, of the force on an aerofoil due to the air pressure caused by motion through the air.

lighter-than-air, applied to an airship that weighs less than the air it displaces.

line of thrust, the line along which the force of the propeller acts.

load dead, the structure, essential accessories and power plant of an aircraft.

load, full, the greatest weight which can be sustained by an aircraft while in flight.

load, useful, the difference between the full load and the dead weight of the aircraft itself.

lobes, bags placed in the stern of the balloon, designed to give it stability of direction.

longeron. See longitudinal.

longitudinal, a fore and aft part of the frame of an aeroplane body, or of the floats. It is usually continuous across a number of points of support.

longitudinal stability, stability in an end-to-end direction.

main plane, the principal plane of a machine with more than one sustaining surface.

monoplane, a machine with a single carrying surface or plane, fixed at either side of the framework carrying the motor, driver's seat, and operating apparatus.

Montgolfier, name commonly applied to the pioneer of modern balloons, constructed by the Montgolfier brothers, Joseph and Stephen, at Annonay, France, in 1782.

multiplane, an aeroplane with two or more sustaining surfaces variously disposed.

nacelle, the frame work or body of an aerial vehicle; most generally applied to dirigibles.

net, a rigging composed of rope and twine, which supports the load on spherical balloons.

ornithopter, a flying machine with "flapping wings," or movable planes.

outrigger, frame work at either end of an aeroplane to support the tail or rudder.

panel, another name for partition.

parachute, an apparatus, umbrella-like in form, for lessening the rapidity of the descent of a falling body.

partition, a rigid vertical wall between two main planes, dividing the space into "cells," open in the direction of travel, and used to afford lateral stability.

pilot, another name for an aeronaut or aviator.

permeability, the name given to the measurement of the loss of gas in a balloon by diffusion through the fabric.

pilot balloon, a small balloon sent adrift to indicate the direction of the wind.

pilot tube, a tube equipped with an open end square to the fluid stream. It is used as a detector of an impact pressure.

plane, usually, a flat surface; in aeroplanes, a curved sustaining surface; also known as "wing."

polyplane, another name for a multiplane.

propeller, the mechanism with two or more blades which changes a rotary force into a straight-line motion; set in the rear in the biplane, in front in the monoplane.

pusher, a type of aeroplane which has its propeller in the rear of the engine.

pylon, a post or pillar used to mark the course.

relative wind, the movement of the air in relation to a moving body.

rib, the horizontal part of a plane or wing construction to which the covering is attached; used to maintain the true form of the plane; its shape fixes the curve of the plane.

rip cord, a cord which runs from the rip panel of the balloon to the basket. Its pulling causes immediate deflation.

rip panel, a strip in the upper part of the balloon which, when torn off, causes immediate deflation.

rudder, a device for changing the direction laterally in a horizontal plane, and for elevating or lowering the plane of travel.

runners, devices attached to the chassis of some machines in preference to wheels to lessen the shock of landing.

seaplane (sē'plān), n. a flying machine designed to rise from and alight upon water.

shock-absorber, any device attached to the chassis for lessening the shock on landing, such as wheels, runners, etc.

side-slipping, the name given to the downward and inward slide of an aircraft during a turn. It results from excessive banking.

single-surfaced, planes ór wings with a single surface, having the ribs and wing bars above or below.

skidding, the motion of sliding sideways, away from the center of the turn, in flight. It is ordinarily caused by insufficient banking.

skids, another name for runner.

slip stream, a stream of air which is driven backwards by the propeller.

soaring flight, an upward movement as distinguished from gliding.

sounding balloon, a small balloon sent aloft to register meteorological conditions.

stabilize, to make stable or maintain equilibrium by various devices.

stabilizer, any device for creating or maintaining stability.

stability, the quality which causes an aircraft in flight to return to a condition of equilibrium when a disturbance is met with.

stalling, a term used to describe the condition of an aeroplane which has lost the speed necessary for control and steerageway.

starboard, the right side.

starting impulse, that which sets the machine in motion; the initial thrust of the propeller, or appliances within or without the machine.

statoscope, an instrument for detecting the existence of a small rate of ascent or descent. It is chiefly used in balloons.

stay, a wire or rope used to hold the parts of an aircraft together, or to add stiffness.

step, a break in the form of the bottom of a float.

strut, the part of a truss frame which gives compression.

stiffener, in the plane construction, a straight bar used to stiffen a flat surface.

supplementary surface, any auxiliary surface, as aileron, fin, rudder, etc.
sustaining surface, a plane or any surface capable of providing sustension.

tail, the rear end of an aeroplane, used to secure greater stability and for the attachment of rudders.
tail fins, the name given to the vertical and horizontal surfaces attached to the tail, which are used for stabilizing.
tetrahedral cell, one of several, with open ends, assembled to impart additional sustaining power to an aeroplane.
thrust, the push of a propeller.
tilting rudder, a rudder attached on an outrigger in front of the main planes of a biplane.
tilting wing tips, wing tips capable of being thrown up or down, to supplement other means of balancing.
torque, the force tending to overturn an aeroplane sideways.
tractor, a type of aeroplane which has its propeller in the front of the engine.
tractor screw, a propeller set in front of an aeroplane, to draw it forward.
trailing edge, the rear portion of an aerofoil.
transverse control, a device to counteract the tendency of an aeroplane to slide sideways from the horizontal, by warping the tips of the planes.
triplane, an aeroplane with three main surfaces.
truss, the frame by which the wing-loads are transmitted to the body of the aircraft. They include struts, stays and spars.

holder, he in whose possession a note or bill may be.
hollow-ware, trade name for cast or wrought iron vessels, kettles, etc.
honor, to accept and pay a note, draft or bill.
husbandage, compensation paid to a "ship's husband" (q.v.). hypothecate, to pledge as security; to mortgage chattels.

immovables, land, houses, and fixtures; real estate.
importer, a merchant who imports goods.
imports, goods brought from a foreign country.
impost, government tax on imported goods.
income, total amount of receipts from all sources; yearly gains.
income tax, a government tax of a percentage on the income of individuals or corporations.
indemnification, making good a loss; securing one against damages.
indemnity, guarantee against loss; freedom; compensation for damages suffered.
index, names of titles or accounts arranged alphabetically. indorse. See endorse.
indulgence, extension of time for payment.
inland bill, a bill of exchange or draft drawn upon a person in the same state or country.
insolvent, unable to pay outstanding liabilities; bankrupt.
installment, a part payment or part delivery of goods.
instant, of the present month, as the 12th inst.
insurable interest, such an interest as will entitle a person to obtain insurance on the life or property of another.
insurance, a contract in which one party, the insurer, agrees in consideration of the premium, to pay a certain sum on the death of the insured or to indemnify him for loss to property by fire or marine risks.
insurance broker, one who negotiates insurance contracts.
interest, money paid for use of money; share in a business or venture.
interest account, in bookkeeping, a separate account of sums paid and received as interest.
internal revenue, government revenue derived from domestic sources.
intestate, not disposed of by a valid will; one who dies without a will.
in transitu [Lat.], on the road; not brought to an end.
inventory, a list of goods and merchandise on hand; any enumeration of articles; a schedule.
investment, placing of money in business or securities.
invoice, account of merchandise shipped, with prices and charges annexed.
invoice book, a book for entering copies of invoices.
involved, confused; embarrassed by liabilities.

jettison, throwing goods overboard or cutting away masts and sails to save a vessel.

jetsam, goods thrown into the sea which have sunk.
jobber, one who buys from importers or manufacturers and sells to retailers; a middleman.
job lot, goods left over; an odd assortment.
joint stock, that held in company; stock formed by the union of several companies.
joint stock company, a business association, the capital of which is represented by shares of stock.
joint tenants, those who have not only unity of possession, but also of title and interest, and the survivor takes the whole.
journal, an account book intermediate between day-book and ledger.
judgment, a judicial decree; decision of a court.
judgment note, one containing a power of attorney from maker to payee to confess judgment for the maker to the extent of face and interest.
jurisdiction, extent of a court's authority as to place, sum, or subject matter.

lame duck, stockbrokers' slang for one unable to meet his liabilities.
land, to discharge cargo; to disembark.
law, merchant, body of law relating to mercantile customs.
law days, days allowed in a charter-party for unloading a ship.
lay down, cost of merchandise, including charges and freight to place of shipment.
lazaretto [Ital.], a place in quarantine where goods are fumigated.
leakage, an allowance made for waste by leaking of casks.
lease, an agreement for letting lands or tenements for life, a term of years or months, or at will.
legal tender, currency or coin which a government has declared shall be received in payment of debts; a formal proffer of money to pay a debt; if refused, the creditor cannot recover.
lessee, one to whom a lease is given.
lessor, one who makes a lease.
letter book, that in which copies of letters sent and received are made.
letter of advice, one giving notice of a shipment made, bill drawn, or other business transaction.
letter of credit, one authorizing credit to a certain amount to be given to the bearer.
letter of license, one by which creditors of an insolvent debtor postpone their claims and allow him to continue trade.
letter of marque, commission from a government to a private ship to seize and destroy ships and property of a hostile country.
letters of administration, authority given to administer an intestate estate, or one in regard to which the executo has refused to act.
letters patent, a writing executed an sealed, granting power and authority t do some act, or enjoy some right.
letters testamentary, authority to a executor to act as such, after probat of will has been made.
liability, that for which one is responsible debts; obligations.
license, permission to trade or act, a liquor license, peddler's license.
lien, a hold or claim on property to secur a debt.
lighterage, payment for unloading ship by lighters or boats.
liquidation, settlement or adjustment o liabilities.
Lloyds', an old association of Englis marine underwriters (insurers) whic formerly met at Lloyd's coffee house London. The company possesses com plete records of everything pertainin to marine matters and has a vast corre spondence. To rate on Lloyd's book as A1 is accepted as conclusive evidenc of excellence.
Lloyds' register, a yearly register of ton nage, age, build, character, and condi tion of ships issued by the Lloyds.
loan, money or property furnished fo temporary use; a public debt.
loan office, an office where loans are ne gotiated.
log-book, a book in which is recorded th daily progress of a vessel, weather note and all incidents.
long price, price after duties are paid.
longshoremen, laborers who load an unload vessels.

manifest, a list or invoice of a ship' cargo and passengers to be exhibited a custom-houses.
manifold writer, a contrivance by whic several copies may be obtained at once it consists of several sheets covered wit a preparation of plumbago.
manufactures, articles which have under gone some process; not crude or raw.
marine insurance, insurance on vessel and cargo.
mark, a letter, figure, or device, by whic goods and prices are distinguished private marks are usually made by select ing a word of ten letters and letting eac letter stand for a digit.
market, a public place of sale for pro visions or other wares.
mart, a market; a place of traffic.
maturity, time fixed for payment; be coming due.
maximum, the highest price or sum.
measurement goods, goods on whic freight is charged by measurement.

mercantile agency, a concern which procures and furnishes information as to the financial standing and credit of business firms.
mercantile paper, notes or bills issued by merchants for goods bought or consigned.
merchant, one who buys and sells goods, generally applied to wholesalers or large dealers.
merchantable, fit for market; in sound condition.
merchant service, trading ships taken collectively; the management of merchant vessels.
merger, absorption of a lesser by a greater debt or obligation.
metallic currency, silver, gold, and copper coinage.
metric system, a decimal system of weights and measures, first established in France; now in general use in Europe and growing into use in English-speaking countries.
minimum, lowest price; least quantity possible.
mint, a place for coining money.
misfeasance, the doing of a lawful act in an unlawful manner.
mitigation, reduction of a penalty or fine; that which in part excuses.
mixed fabrics, those composed of more than one kind of fibre, as wool and cotton.
money, the measure of value and medium of exchange; strictly speaking, money must have intrinsic value to the amount it represents, as gold or silver; but bank notes and sometimes checks are included.
money-broker, one who deals in money.
money market, the general system of cash loans; the exchange of different kinds of currency.
money order, an order requesting one person to pay money to another; not negotiable; most commonly used of post-office orders.
monopoly, sole power of dealing in certain class of goods.
mortgage, a conditional conveyance of property, to become void upon fulfillment of the condition, as, the payment of a note.
mortgage deed, a deed of the nature of a mortgage.
mortgagee, the person to whom property is mortgaged.
mortgagor, one who gives a mortgage.
movables, personal property; property not fixed.
muster, a collection of samples.

national banks, banks organized under the conditions of an act of Congress; they can issue bank notes only to the amount of United States bonds they have deposited in the U. S. Treasury.
negotiable paper, notes, bills and drafts which may be transferred with all their rights by indorsement or assignment.
negotiations, agreeing upon a mercantile transaction; making a bargain; fixing a price.
net, the clear amount; what remains after deducting charges and expenses.
net profits, clear profits, after deducting losses.
net weight, weight of merchandise without bag, box, or covering.
nominal, in name only; very small, as, a nominal price.
non-feasance, the not doing of what ought to be done.
notary public, a public officer who attests or certifies to acknowledgment of deeds and other papers, protests, notes and bills, etc.
notarial seal, seal of a notary public.
note of hand, a written undertaking to pay money at a certain time.
note book, a book in which notes of hand are recorded.

obligation, a duty; a binding engagement; bond with condition annexed.
on sale, goods left with another person to sell on account.
open account, a running or unsettled account.
opening, the display of a new stock of goods for sale.
open policy, in marine insurance a policy which covers undefined risks.
option, permission to choose; in stock-broking, privilege of taking or delivering stock at a given day and price.
order, a commission to purchase; directions to pay money or deliver goods.
order book, that in which orders received are entered.
ordinary, a ship in harbor is said to be in ordinary; of medium quality.
outstanding accounts, book debts not yet collected.
overdraw, to call for more money than is on deposit.
overdue, applied to a note or draft the specified time for payment of which has passed.
overt, apparent; manifest; open.

package, a bundle; a parcel; a bale.
panic, a monetary pressure; financial crisis.
paper, negotiable evidence of indebtedness.
paper money, bills of banks or the government passing current as money.
parole [Fr.], not written, as, parole evidence.
par value, the face or nominal value.

par of exchange, the value of a unit of one's country's coinage expressed in that of another's.
partner, an associate in business; member of a partnership.
partnership, contract of two or more persons to join money, stock, or skill in trade for mutual benefit.
part owner, one of several owners of a ship; the relation differs materially from partnership.
pass book, a book kept by a customer in which entries of purchases are made; a bankbook.
passport, a permission from a government to travel, with identification and certificate of nationality.
pawnbroker, one who lends money at interest on security of goods deposited.
payable, justly due; capable of payment.
payee, the person to whose order a note, bill, or draft is to be paid.
per cent [Lat.], by the hundred; rates of interest, discount, etc.
percentage [Lat.], an allowance reckoned by hundredth parts; commission.
per contra [Lat.], to the opposite side of an account.
permit, written authority to remove dutiable goods.
petty cash book, account of small receipts and expenses.
policy, the instrument by which the contract of insurance is made.
port, a harbor for vessels; a commercial city.
port of entry, a port where a custom-house is established for the entry of imports.
post-date, to date after the real time.
posting, to transfer from day-book or journal to the ledger.
post obit, a promise to pay loans after the death of some person.
power of attorney, written authority from one person to another to act for him. preferred creditor, one whose claims a bankrupt debtor elects to settle first.
premium, a sum beyond par value; the amount paid annually in insurance contracts.
price current, a statement showing prevailing price of merchandise, stock, or securities.
price list, a list of articles with prices attached.
prime, of high quality; superior.
principal, the sum on which interest is paid.
proceeds, the sum realized by a sale.
procuration, a general letter or power of attorney.
produce, farm products of all kinds.
profit and loss, an account in which gains and losses are balanced.
promissory note, a written promise to pay.
pro rata [Lat.], a proportional distribution. protective tariff, duty imposed on imports to encourage manufacturers.
protest, notice to the sureties of a not that it was not paid at maturity or to th drawer of a draft that acceptance was re fused.
purveyor, one who supplies provisions.

quarantine, restraint of intercourse t which a ship is subjected on suspicion c infection; the place of such restraint.
quitrent, rent paid by tenant of a free hold, discharging him from other rent.
quotation, current prices of stocks o commodities.

real estate, land, houses and fixtures; al immovable property.
rebate, deduction; abatement; discount giving back part of sum already paid.
receipt, a written acknowledgment o payment. receipt book, a book in which receipt are filed.
receiver, an officer appointed by a cour to hold in trust property in litigation, o to wind up the affairs of a bankrup concern.
recoup, to counterbalance losses by gains rectification, second distillation of alco holic liquors.
register, a ship's paper, issued by th custom-house, stating description, name tonnage, nationality, and ownership.
re-insurance, transfer of part of the con tract of insurance from one insurer t another.
remittance, transfer of funds from on party to another.
renewal, giving a new note for an old one extension of time.
rent, compensation for the use of rea estate.
rente, a French term equivalent to gov ernment annuity.
repository, a warehouse or storehouse.
reprisal, the seizure of ships or propert to indemnify for unlawful seizure or de tention.
respondentia bond, a bond for a loa secured by the cargo of a ship.
retail, to sell in small quantities.
returns, profit on an investment.
revenue, income of a state; taxes receive revenue cutter, a small governmen vessel used in collecting taxes and pre venting smuggling. reversion, right to possess property aft the happening of some event, as th death of a person.

sale, transfer of property for a consideratio salvage, compensation given those wh rescue ship or cargo from loss.

salvor, one who voluntarily engages in saving a ship or cargo from peril.
sample a small portion of merchandise taken as a specimen of quality.
sans recours [Fr.], without recourse; sometimes added to an indorsement of a note or bill to protect indorser from liability.
scrip, certificate of stock given before registration.
seaworthy, fit for a voyage and properly equipped.
securities, documents securing a right to property.
sell, to make a sale; to transfer for consideration.
set-off, a counter claim or cross debt arising from a different matter from the one in question.
share, interest owned by one of a number; unit of the division of stock.
ship, technically, a three-masted square-rigged vessel; commonly used for any large vessel. shipment, quantity of goods dispatched.
shipper, one who dispatches goods by vessel or other conveyance.
shipping, collective term for a number of vessels.
shipping articles, articles of agreement between captain and seamen.
shipping clerk, one who oversees the forwarding of merchandise.
ship's husband, one who attends to the requisite repairs of a ship while in port, and does all the other necessary acts preparatory to a voyage.
ship's papers, papers which a vessel must carry; register, sea-letter, log-book, bill of health, shipping articles, etc.
ship's stores, provisions, fuel, cables, extra spars, etc.
short, to "sell short" is to sell for future delivery what one has not got in hopes that prices will fall.
short exchange, bills of exchange payable at sight or in a few days.
shrinkage, reduction in bulk or measurement.
sight, the time when a bill is presented to the drawee, sight draft, one payable at sight, i.e., when presented.
signature, the name of a person written by himself.
silent partner, one who furnishes capital, but takes no active part in a business.
simple interest, interest on principal alone; not compound.
sinking fund, a fund set apart from revenue to pay a public or corporation debt.
smuggling, introducing goods into a country without paying duties.
solvent, able to meet all liabilities.
specialty, a written, sealed, and delivered contract.
specie, any kind of coined money.
specification, a written description and enumeration of particulars.
speculation, a business investment out of the ordinary run of trade.
stamp duty, law requiring stamps to be affixed to checks and proprietary articles.
staple, principal commodity of a country or district.
statute law, body of laws established by legislative enactment; written as opposed to unwritten or common law.
sterling, lawful or standard money of Great Britain.
stock, shares in the capital of corporations; goods on hand.
stockbroker, one who buys and sells stock on commission.
stock exchange, place where shares of stock are bought and sold.
stock-holder, one who holds shares of stock.
stock jobber, one who speculates in stocks.
stoppage in transitu, [Lat.], right of seller to stop goods "on their passage" if purchaser has become insolvent.
storage, sums paid for storing goods.
storekeeper, officer in charge of a bonded warehouse.
stowage, careful arrangement of cargo in a ship.
subpœna, a writ commanding a witness to appear in court.
subpœna duces tecum, a subpœna requiring witness to bring papers with him.
subrogation, putting one thing in place of another; substituting one creditor for another.
sundries, unclassified articles.
supercargo, an agent who accompanies cargo to care for and sell it.
surety, one who binds himself to pay money in case another person fails to pay, to fill a contract, or to serve with integrity.
surveyor, agent of an insurance company to examine and report on applications for marine or fire insurance.
suspend, to fail; to stop payment.
suspense account, an account made of doubtful balances to ascertain probable profit or loss.
sutler, one authorized to sell goods to an army.
suttle weight, weight after tare is deducted.

tale quale [Lat.], "such as"; used to denote that cargo is presumed to correspond with sample, and that buyer takes the risk of deterioration.
tally, keeping account by checking off.
tally man, one who receives payment for goods in weekly installments.

tare, allowance in weight or quantity on account of cask, bag, or covering. Actual tare: when each cask, etc. is weighed. Average tare: when one is weighed as a sample. Estimated tare: when a fixed percentage is allowed.
tariff, rate or list of duties; price list.
teller, officer of a bank who receives or pays out money.
tenants, those who lease or rent real estate.
tenants in common, persons holding the same property in common, i.e., by distinct titles and not as joint tenants.
tender, offer to supply money or articles. See legal tender.
ten forties. United States Government bonds, which could be redeemed by the government in ten years or allowed to run for forty.
tenor, intent, nature, character; sometimes an exact copy.
textile fabrics, all woven or piece goods.
testator, one who has made a will; feminine form, testatrix.
time bargain, a contract for the future sale of stock.
tonnage, the weight a ship will carry in tons; capacity of a vessel.
tort, a private or civil injury for which damages will lie.
trade, buying and selling; commerce; traffic.
trade discount, an allowance made to dealers in the same line.
trade-mark, letters, figures, or devices used on goods and labels which a manufacturer has the sole right to use.
trade price, that allowed by wholesalers to retailers.
trade sale, an auction by and for the trade; especially of booksellers.
trades-union, a combination of workingmen to protect their own interests.
traffic, business done; especially that of a railroad.
transshipment, removing goods from one ship or conveyance to another.
transportation, conveying goods from one place to another.
transit duty, tax imposed on goods for passing through a country.
traveler, a commercial agent; a drummer.
treasury notes, those issued by government and passing current as money.
treaty, an agreement or compact between two or more nations.
tret, allowance for waste of 4 lbs. in 104 lbs., after tare has been deducted.
triplicate, to make three copies of a paper; the third copy.
trustee, process, same as garnishment, (q.v.).

U

ullage, what a cask lacks of being full.
unclaimed goods, goods in government storehouses unclaimed after three years from importation, or on which duties have not been paid, may be sold at auction.
undersell, to sell below the trade price.
underwriter, a marine insurer; an individual, not a company.
unseaworthy, unfit for a voyage in condition or equipment.
unsound, in bad condition; of doubtful solvency.
usance, the time allowed by usage for the payment of a bill of exchange; it differs greatly in different countries; any business custom.
usury, interest beyond the lawful rate.

valid, of force; binding; good in law.
value, to estimate; worth.
value received, phrase used in notes and bills to express a consideration indefinitely.
vendee, one to whom something is sold.
vendor, a seller.
vendue, an auction sale.
venture, a mercantile speculation or investment.
void, that which is of no legal effect.
voidable, that which may become of no legal effect if proper steps are taken.
voucher, a book, receipt, entry, or other document which establishes the truth of accounts.

warehouseman, one who stores goods for pay.
waiver, relinquishment of a legal right or privilege.
warranty, an undertaking that goods or title are as represented.
wastage, loss in handling; shrinkage.
waste, refuse material.
way bill, list of goods given to a carrier.
wharfage, fees paid for use of a wharf.
wood acid, pyroligneous acid, distilled from oak, beech, ash and other woods, and used by calico printers.
woody wool, the wool or wadding manufactured from pine leaves in Breslau.
wootz, a species of steel made in the East Indies from magnetic ore, valuable for edge tools. wreckage, merchandise saved from a wreck.
wurris, a powder obtained from the seeds of euphorbia and used as a red dye for silk.

DICTIONARY OF RADIO WORDS AND TERMS

"A" battery, a battery for heating the filament in the vacuum tube.

acmedyne receiver, an improved radio-frequency amplifier.

aerial, the part of a radio-telegraphic station used for transferring the energy of the transmitter to the ether, or, in the case of a receiving aerial, for collecting the energy from the ether for use in the receiver.

aerial circuit, the distance between the free or insulated end of the aerial and the connection with the earth.

aerial tuning condenser, a variable condenser employed in the aerial circuit.

alternating current, a current which periodically changes its direction of flow.

alternator, a generator of alternating currents.

ammeter, an instrument for the measurement of the number of amperes connected in series in circuit.

ampere, a unit of measurement of current representing a flow of one coulomb per second.

ampere hour, the quantity of current flowing in one hour through circuit carrying one ampere—3,600 coulombs.

amplifier, an instrument for increasing the intensity of reception.

amplitude, distance from beginning to crest of wave; an indication of strength of radio wave.

anode, the positive terminal.

antenna, another term for aerial.

anti-induction conductor, a conductor which is so made as to avoid the effects of induction.

antiodes, in a train of waves or oscillations, the points of greatest amplitude.

anti-spark disks, disks made of ebonite placed at intervals along the Bradfield Tube, for the purpose of preventing sparks in wet weather.

aperiodic, that which has no definite individual period.

aperiodic receiver, one ready to respond to all waves, whatever their periods might be.

arc, the act of passing electricity through a gas.

arc generator, a system which involves the employment of arcs for the production of continuous or undamped oscillations.

arc rectifier, an instrument for changing A. C. to D. C.

arc spark, a spark in which there is a light arcing, which is produced by a current from the transformer leaking across a gap which is too small.

Armstrong circuit, the name originally given to the present regenerative circuit. See Regenerative Circuit.

arrester, apparatus with large sparking surface and short air-gap, placed in series with the earth-lead of the transmitter; a lead is taken to the receiving apparatus from the side of the spark-gap remote from the earth; used for controlling signals on circuit, and for keeping the aerial earthed in thunder-storms and other disturbances.

atmospherics, atmospheric disturbances which are induced by strong sunlight, thunder storms, etc.

audibility meter, an instrument for measuring the comparative strength of incoming signals.

audio frequencies, frequencies which correspond to the vibrations normally audible to the human ear.

audiometer, a meter for measuring audibility.

audion, the De Forest valve detector consisting of 3 electrodes in a vacuum bulb; a heated filament—a grid and a plate.

auto-jigger, a device by which the inductance of the primary circuit is formed from a certain number of turns of the secondary circuit.

automatic recorder, apparatus capable of working up to several hundred words a minute; now used in place of original hand mechanism; permits an enormously greater speed in transmission.

automatic transformer, a transformer with one coil instead of two. A part of the coil is crossed by the primary and part by the secondary current.

automatic transmitter, apparatus substituted for the hand-worked signalling key; insures greater regularity and speed.

auxiliary anode, the third element of the amplifier.

"B" battery, "plate" battery in the vacuum tube.

balancing set, in a three-wire system, a dynamo used to balance the electromotive force.

bank winding, a form of winding inductance in multiple layers so that distributed capacity is minimized.

bar magnet, a straight bar of magnetized steel barretter, a thermo detector.

battery, a collection of elements or units such as voltaic cells and leyden jars.

beats, a periodic effect induced by the difference between vibrations when thrown into interference.

bias, small battery connection applied so that negative voltage affects grid.

binding post, an arrangement of screws and nuts used on radio apparatus to make the proper connections to and from an outside source.

blower, a rotary, motor-driven fan, used for drawing in air at atmospheric pressure and delivering it in high pressure blasts; prevents the formation of arcs.

Bradfield insulator, ebonite insulator strengthened by a metal core, used for leading-in the aerial to the interior of a building; withstands high potentials of transmission.

bridging condenser, a condenser used in a circuit for providing a low impedence path for high-frequency currents across low-frequency apparatus.

broadcasting. See Radiocasting.

brush discharge, a discharge taking place on surface of conductors charged to high potential.

bus bar, a broad lead to which the smaller leads from the units of a condenser battery are joined.

buzzer, small apparatus for producing feeble oscillations, used for tests and calls.

buzzer, practice, combination of buzzer and signalling key for practicing signalling.

buzzer, tuned, common buzzer with the coils of the electro-magnet shunted by a non-inductive resistance.

by-pass condenser. See Bridging Condenser.

"C" Battery, a low voltage battery connected between the filament and the "grid" to give to the latter a negative potential.

calibration, act of determining wave length, frequency, or dial adjustment.

call bell, a device by which incoming signals, especially those of distress, attract the attention of the operator even if he is off duty.

call letters, letters assigned by the Government as designations to all radio transmitters.

capacity, the property by which a condenser stores up electrical energy; measured by the number of coulombs the condenser will hold when the difference of pressure between the two extreme plates is one volt.

cascade, a series of condensers or stages of amplification.

cathode, a terminal of an electric circuit.

cat whisker, a fine wire used to make connection with crystal detector.

charger, device that permits definite amount of electricity to flow in recharging storage battery.

choke cells, cells which are wound so as to have great self-induction, usually over an iron core.

choke coils, wire coils wound with iron centre.

choking coil, a coil of wire wound in such a way as to have great self-induction.

circuits, a circuit in which oscillations are possible and there is no distinct break of continuity is called a closed oscillating circuit; a condenser in which the plates are very remote converts a closed oscillating circuit into an open or radiating oscillating circuit.

close-coupling, a term used when in a tuning coil or set of coils for transformer the primary and secondary are close together.

closed oscillating circuit. See circuits.

coherer, an imperfect contact or collection of such contacts, so arranged that when brought under the influence of the incoming electro-magnet wave it allows current from a local battery to pass and make some kind of signal.

coil induction, a device similar to a transformer, which has a laminated iron core and a primary and secondary coil.

compass, wireless, one of several forms of direction-finders, which enables an operator to get the bearings of a station transmitting a signal by turning a handle over a marked scale.

commutator, a series of moving or movable contacts by which the direction of the current in a system can be changed.

condenser unit, a system composed of two conducting surfaces placed close together and separated by an insulator.

conductor, material which will freely carry electricity; wire, etc.

continuous current, a current which invariably runs in the same direction. Its opposite is the alternating current.

continuous waves, waves with constant amplitude produced by multiplying transformers.

converter, apparatus for changing potential of electric current.

core, the iron centre of electro magnet.

corrosion, action of elements in eating away metal parts of battery or outdoor antenna.

coulomb, quantity of electricity flowing in one second through a circuit carrying current of one ampere.

counterpoise, one or several wires stretched directly above the ground but insulated from it.

coupling, the ratio of the mutual induction between two circuits compared with the self-inductance of each circuit.

coupling, direct, where one circuit is linked to another in such a way that a portion of one circuit forms part of the other, or where there is direct electrical connection between the second circuit and a point in the first.

crystal detector, the use of certain metallic crystals in a radio receiving circuit which have a property of rectifying incoming signal oscillations into direct current.

current, secondary, current induced in a secondary coil of transformer or inductance.

cut-out, apparatus having the function of a fuse, but not acting by the fusing of a conductor.

cycle, period of alternation.

cymometer, instrument for measuring the wave length and frequency of an electro-magnetic wave.

cymoscope, instrument which shows the presence of minute currents; a detector; depends on its rectifying action on a train of oscillations.

damping, decrease in amplitude in a train of waves.

decrement, percentage of decrease of amplitude in oscillation.

decrement, logarithmic, a measure or the ratio of decay of an electric oscillation under the influence of damping.

detector, an apparatus which changes the oscillations received through the antenna-ground circuit into audible currents.

dial, disc mounted on shaft for adjusting rotating parts of set.

dia-magnetic, non-magnetic.

dielectric, a medium through which electric energy can be transmitted by an electrical strain in the medium.

diode, vacuum tube which contains two elements, used only in place of crystal detector.

direct coupling, inductance coupling where primary and secondary coils are connected metallically.

direct current, an electric current which flows continuously in one direction.

discharger, the device in the primary oscillating circuit at which the spark or arc occurs.

disc condenser, a variable condenser which has two sets of plates composed of semi-circular, interleafing metal vanes separated by insulating disks or air.

disc discharger, a disk which has numerous metal studs on its periphery. These are capable of adjustment. The whole is rapidly revolved between two electrodes which may be either fixed or formed of rotating disks with or without studs.

duo-lateral coils, a special form of inductance coils taking their name from their characteristic winding.

duplex radio telegraphy, a system by which messages can be sent and received simultaneously without interference.

dynamo, a machine which converts mechanical energy into electrical energy.

earth arrester, a small spark gap which consists of two brass disks separated by a disk of mica. The top plate is connected with the aerial and the lower with the earth.

earth plate, a plate of metal which is buried in the earth, to which is attached the earth connection.

earths, the metallic connections of the lower extremities of aerials with the upper crust of the earth.

ebonite, a non-conductor based on vulcanized rubber.

eddy currents, the stray currents in core of electro-magnet causing loss of energy due to induction pressures.

einthoven, an exceedingly sensitive galvanometer for indicating received signals, in which the moving part is a fine stretched conducting string.

electrodes, specially devised terminals which pass electric current through any desired substance.

electrolysis, the disintegrating of a compound into its component elements by the passage of an electric current through it.

electrolytic detector, a detector employing an electrolyte such as a 10 per cent sulphuric acid solution in a platinum container; platinum wire in contact with electrolyte is connected to battery as is the platinum container. Electrolysis due to current through electrolyte keeps platinum point covered with minute bubbles which act as insulators. Oscillations from outside source of alternating current break through bubbles, permit intermittent circuit to flow from battery through phones producing signal.

electro-magnet, a magnet which is given energy by passing an electric current through its winding.

electron, smallest known part of matter; principle of vacuum tube is based on theory of electrons.

electron, the final unit of negative electricity.

electroscope, apparatus for detecting small static charges.

electro-static, an electrically charged body through which no current flows.

E. M. F., electromotive force. Its unit is the volt which is the electric pressure forcing a current of one ampere through resistance of one ohm.

ether, an assumed medium which is supposed to pervade all space and the interior of solid bodies.

fading, fluctuation of strength of radio signal caused by atmospheric disturbances.

farad, the unit of electrical capacity.

feed-back, the energy which returns from the plate circuit to the grid of the vacuum tube. The name is also applied to the means for returning it in the regenerative circuit.

feeder, a main wire or set of wires.

feeder negative, the wire which is connected to the negative pole of the generator.

feeder neutral, the wire which is connected to the middle or neutral point in a three-wire system. The wire is common to both generators.

feeder positive, the wire which is connected to the positive pole of the generator.

filament, the heated element in the vacuum tube which gives forth the electrons.

flux, a compound for soldering; facilitates the uniting of molten metals; magnetic flux, the flow of magnetic current about the field of a magnet.

frequency, term used in connection with any form of rhythmical motion or change, denoting the number of complete movements or changes in a given time, usually a second.

frequency, high, under the latest demarcation between high and low frequency, a frequency measured in thousands or millions of periods per second.

frequency, low, a frequency measured in tens or hundreds of periods per second.

fundamental, the fundamental note, swing, or oscillation of a system is the one which fits in with the formula giving the time-period in terms of those of its properties which affect that period. See time period.

galvanometer. See einthoven.

gap micrometer, a short gap which is designed to protect apparatus from too high potentials.

geissler tube, a vacuum tube which has its electrodes placed in bulbs in either end.

generator, a machine which changes into electrical energy, mechanical energy.

glass silencer, a glass tube which has wooden ends with holes to admit the discharge rods of an induction coil, thus enclosing the spark gap.

grid, a frame of wire gauze or spiral between and insulated from the plate and filament of a vacuum tube.

grid bias, a negative potential which is applied to the grid of the detector or the amplifier tube.

grid leak, a resistance across grid condenser or between grid and filament for leakage of excess grid charges.

ground, a counterpart on the earth of the aerial or antenna.

ground wires, wires which give connection to the earth.

H

harmonics, waves whose frequencies bear a definite relation to that of the fundamental; the first harmonic of an aerial has a frequency three times as great as that of the fundamental; the second harmonic, five times as great, and so on.

helix, a hollow core wound with one layer of wire.

henry, the unit for measuring inductance; the change of amperage of one ampere per second, in an inductance producing a difference in potential of one volt.

hertzian oscillator, a device consisting of two metal sheets or wings separated by a spark gap. They are used to produce oscillations which give rise to ether waves.

hertzian waves, a name given to the electro-magnetic waves discovered by Professor Hertz in 1887.

heterodyne, the production of "beats" in radio, brought about by placing one continuous wave energy against another and thus producing a beat note, which corresponds to the difference between the two continuous wave frequencies.

high frequency, frequencies over a few thousands per second.

honeycomb coil, a multiple layer coil wound diagonally in lattice like formation.

hook-up, the diagram which shows the connections and construction of a radio receiver or transmitter.

horizontal aerials, those which have the larger part of their length parallel with the surface of the earth.

hot wire ammeter, an instrument for measuring amperage by means of the expansion of wire through heat. Indicated by a pointer and graduated scale.

hydrometer, a floating instrument which measures the density of a liquid, for testing charge of batteries.

hysteresis, the lagging of an effect behind the cause producing it; generally due to friction of some kind.

I

impedance, resistance offered by coil of wire to a current due to back E. M. F.

impedance coil, a coil of wire which is wound around a soft iron core.

inductance, the property of an electric circuit by which it tends to oppose any change in the value of the current flowing therein; the opposition being effected by the production of an electromotive force in such a direction as to lessen the change producing it.

inductance coil, a coil of wire which is arranged so that it has a large amount of inductance. It is called also a choking coil.

inductive coupling, the coupling of two oscillation circuits by placing coil of one in magnetic field of the other.

insulating tape, a specially prepared tape for covering and insulating the ends of wires when making joints.

insulator, a material which is a non-conductor of electricity.

interference, the interaction of two waves of different frequencies, or of two waves of the same frequency, but different phase acting in the same circuit, resulting in the formation of nodes and loops. See loop.

interrupter, a device for breaking up a continuous current into a succession of pulses more or less rapid.

ion, an atom of matter which carries an electron, or an atom which has been deprived of electrons.

ionization, another term for electrolysis.

jack, a device into which is fitted the connecting plug.

jamming, interference from undesired station.

jigger, a form of potential transformer designed for high-frequency (oscillating) currents, and used both in transmitting and receiving.

joule, unit of electrical work denoted by work done by one coulomb under one volt pressure. One coulomb per second equals one joule per second or one watt.

kathode, the point at which the current leaves the compound in electrolysis.

kathode rays, electrons given off by the kathode of a vacuum tube.

key, high-tension transmitting, a device by which the transmitting circuit is made and broken by a switch in the high-tension leads of the transformer, controlled by the ordinary manipulating key.

kilocycle, the sum of one thousand cycles.

kilowatt, one thousand watts. Also written K.W.

lamp, tuning, a small, low-voltage incandescent-filament lamp, arranged so that it can take a small fraction of the oscillating current induced in the earth-lead of the transmitter. The amount of glow produced by the lamp indicates the total current in the earth-lead, and the lamp is effective in tuning the primary and secondary circuits.

lead, a wire which leads from one instrument to another.

lead-in, the connecting wire and cable between the antenna and the radio equipment.

leyden jar, a glass jar with inner and outer surfaces coated with tin foil. Used as a condenser.

lightning arrester, device that will cause lightning striking antenna to pass to ground without harm.

loading coil, an added coil used to increase the wave length range of a circuit.

lodestone, iron ore having natural magnetic properties and also known as magnetite.

loop, a point of maximum potential in a circuit or part of a circuit along which the potential is gradually rising or falling. When the aerial circuit is vibrating freely it will always have a node of potential at the earth and an anti-node or loop at its free end.

loop aerial, a frame, preferably four feet square wound with multiple turns of wire. It has directional qualities which have given it name of radio compass.

loose coupler, same as variocoupler, which see.

loud speaker, a device which reproduces signals loud enough to enable head phones to be dispensed with.

low frequency current, a current having a frequency of but a few hundreds per second.

magnavox loud speaker, a device which, by use of the electro-dynamic principal with a powerful magnet, increases the volume of tone.

magnet, piece of steel wound with insulated copper wire, used in bells and buzzers.

Marconi filings coherer, a glass tube which contains fine, metallic filings. It is used as a detector.

mast, steel, a type of mast built up of hollow steel sections of semi-circular shape after a system which enables it to be erected to great heights without any scaffolding.

megohm, one million ohms.

meter ampere, an instrument which is used for measuring the flow of electric current.

meter volt, an instrument for measuring the pressure or voltage of an electric circuit.

meter watt, an instrument designed for measuring the wattage of an electric current.

mica, a mineral insulator transparent in varying degrees.

micro, one millionth.

microfarad, unit of capacity measurement.

micrometer spark-gap, a small, delicately adjustable spark-gap used to protect receivers, etc., against atmospheric discharges and other adverse influences.

microphone, an instrument for magnifying sound.

millihenry, one-thousandth part of the henry.

millimeter, one thousandth part of a meter.

modulator, a device by means of which the amplitude of one current in accordance with the variation in another current is varied.

motor-generator, a combination of a motor and generator for changing one kind of current into another.

multiple action, system by which one station can send two or more messages simultaneously to two or more other stations, and receive similarly from them.

natural frequency, the wave length of any aerial or circuit without inductance or capacity devices.

natural wave lengths, the natural length of waves produced by the capacity of the aerial and inductance.

negative, the opposite of positive in an electric current.

neutral wire, in a three-wire system, the middle wire common to both dynamos.

neutrodyne, a radio frequency receiver which receives its name from the method used to neutralize a capacity between the grid and the plate in each vacuum tube.

node. See loop.

non-conductor, any material which does not conduct electricity.

note tuning, the synchronization of the receiver to the frequency of the wave-trains, instead of to the frequency of the waves themselves.

ohm, the resistance of a column of mercury 106.3 centimeters long by one square millimeter cross section at zero centigrade.

ohms-law, the fundamental law of electricity by which it is found that the current in amperes which flows through a circuit equals the pressure in volts, divided by the resistance in ohms.

oscillations, eletcric, alternating currents of high frequency, such as are produced by the discharge of a condenser through a circuit whose resistance does not exceed a certain value in comparison with the inductance and capacity.

oscillations, free and forced, an oscillation is free when it has the same frequency as that of the fundamental or one of the harmonics of the circuit, and forced when otherwise.

oscillator, hertzian, a device for producing oscillations.

oxidization, see corrosion.

period, the time required for the completion of a full cycle of an oscillating circuit.

periodic time, the time of a completed period.

photoradiogram (fō-to-rā′di-o-gram), n. a photograph or picture transmitted by wireless.

plain aerial, term applied to the receiving circuit when the detector is placed directly in series with the receiving aerial and the earth.

plate, in the vacuum tube the positive member or electro.

plug, a device employed to connect the head phones or loud speaker to the receiver.

polyphase, a plurity of phases.

polarization, the changing of the voltaic cell by depriving it of its proper pressure.

positive pole, the pole from which the electric current starts on its way around the circuit.

potential, the degree of pressure of an electrical charge.

potentiometer, an instrument for varying and controlling potential in a circuit.

primary, the winding of a transformer or coupler in which a current is impressed.

radiating circuit, the circuit of the aerial.

radiation, the transmission of ether waves through space in every direction.

radio (rā′di-ō), n. anything transmitted or received by electric waves; a radio telephone; a radiotelegraph; wireless telephony; wireless telegraphy: adj. of, pertaining to, or operated by, radiant energy; wireless.

radio-, a combining form from the Latin radius, ray, indicating (1) connection with the radius of the forearm, or (2) pertaining to any radioactive property.

radiocasting, the sending out of radio programs or messages from established stations.

radiodyne receiver, a type of receiver which makes use of fixed inductances in transformers with variable condensers.

radio frequencies, frequencies which correspond to vibrations which are not audible normally to the human ear.

radio telephony, the transmission of speech by means of electro magnetic waves.

radiotron, another name for vacuum tubes, which see.

receiving detector, an arrangement for changing the characteristics of incoming oscillations so as to make them audible.

reactance, opposition to back E. M. F. to flow of current.

rectifier, a device for converting alternating or oscillating currents into continuous currents, or into pulses of unidirectional current.

reflex, the process of using for radio-frequency amplification and, following detection, for audio-frequency amplification the same vacuum tubes.

refraction, the changing in the direction, or bending of electric waves.

regenerative circuit, a circuit wherein part of the plate current is impressed upon the grid circuit through inductance —resulting in increase in grid current.

rejector circuit. See wave trap.

relay, an apparatus for opening and closing an outside circuit, through an electro magnet actuated by a received current.

resistance, the property of a conductor which opposes the flow of an electric current.

resonance, the production of vibrations in a body or a circuit by the action of a periodic force which has the same period as the natural period of the body or circuit.

resonator, a box for producing sound.

retardation, the retarding of the rate of the transmission of signals.

rheostat, a device used to control or regulate the flow of current.

rotor, revolving parts of radio apparatus.

secondary, the winding of a transformer or coupler which receives energy from the primary winding and delivers this to the secondary circuit.

selectivity, the property of a receiving apparatus by which it can select or pick out the waves from the station which it wants to receive, to the exclusion of any other waves from other stations or from the atmosphere.

series, an electrical connection where current passes through circuits successively.

sharp tuning, the effect produced by a slight change in the strength of the signals.

short circuit, two opposite poles of a circuit coming in contact without a controlling force.

shunt, a system of connection where the circuit or instrument is connected in parallel with the main circuit.

signals, the electrical energy which conveys intelligent or coherent messages.

solenoid, an electro magnetic coil without the iron core.

stand-by, notification to listeners to keep tuning positions for brief wait.

static, atmospheric disturbance causing interference.

static transformer, a transformer which has immovable parts.

stator, a fixed coil in which rotor moves, as in variometers.

step-down transformer, a transformer which steps down the amount of voltage and raises the amperage.

step-up transformer, a transformer which steps up the voltage and lowers the amperage.

storage battery, an accumulator of electrical energy.

super-audible, a frequency which is above the range of audibility.

superdyne, receiving set containing combination of regeneration and magnetic neutralization.

super-heterodyne, in receiving, the process of playing off the incoming radio wave against a locally generative frequency.

super-regenerative, the amplification of radio signals by frequently damping the circuit.

synchrony, the adjustment of one circuit to another or of one transmitter to one receiver so that the time-periods are the same throughout the system.

tapper, a small vibrating hammer used for restoring certain forms of coherer to a condition of non-conductivity on the cessation of signals.

taps, means of varying number of turns on an inductance coil; wire that is looped out in winding is called the tap.

telefunken, a German term for radio.

Tesla coil, an oscillating transformer.

three wire system, a system for distributing electrical current in which three wires instead of two are used. The middle wire is neutral and acts as a positive for one side and as a negative for the other side of the system.

tickler coil, the coil in the plate circuit which causes regeneration by transferring energy to the grid circuit.

time-period, in electrical oscillating circuits, time-periods are ascertained by the amount of inductance, capacity, and resistance in the circuit.

train of waves, the group of oscillations sent out from an aerial at every discharge of the primary circuit.

transformer, a device used for transmittance of energy from one circuit to another. This may be done either with or without change in the voltage.

transmitter, a device for producing the sounds to be transmitted.

tuner, the part of a circuit employed to alter the wave length or tune.

tuning, the altering of the capacity or inductance value in a radio circuit.

two phase current, a system of electrical distribution which makes use of two currents of different phase. It can be used with either three or four wires.

U

ultra audion, an audion which has a type of energy coupling so that a powerful relay action may be obtained.

ultradyne receiver, a receiver which employs the modulation method, which is a development of the super-heterodyne.

undamped waves, train of, one in which the amplitude of each successive wave is equal to that of the wave preceding and following it.

vacuum tube, a glass tube from which the air has been exhausted, containing a filament, a plate and a grid. A vacuum tube is used for detection, amplification, modulation and generation.

valve amplifier, an audion type of vacuum tube which contains three electrodes.

variocouoler, an instrument for varying the inductance in a circuit in which the primary and secondary coils are not connected metallically but by mutual inductance.

variometer, an instrument for varying the inductance in a circuit in which two inductances are connected metallically in series.

variable condenser, a condenser usually made of two sets of plates separated by air as a dielectric, allowing the easy and quick variation of capacity.

vario-transformer, a coupling device to connect the tubes in a radio-frequency amplification.

vernier, a device for adjusting any given control.

volt, the unit of electrical pressure.

voltage, the amount of electric motive force or pressure.

voltmeter, an instrument for measuring E. M. F. or pressure in volts.

watt, the unit of electrical power used in practice. The Watt measurement being equal to the amperes multiplied by the voltage.

wave-length, the distance between any point in a wave and the corresponding point in the wave immediately preceding and following it.

wave meter, an instrument for measuring wave lengths.

wave trap, a circuit which can be tuned to eliminate any undesired signal.

wired wireless, the employment of electric power wires and telephone wires in radio transmitting and receiving.

DICTIONARY OF MUSIC

a ballata, in ballad style.
a battuta, in exact beat; true time.
a cappella, in church or chapel style; for chorus, without accompaniment.
a capriccio, as you please.
a deux temps, two crotchets or beats in a bar.
a due, for two voices or instruments; separately or in unison.
a piacere, at the performer's pleasure as to time.
a quatre mains, for four hands, as a pianoforte duet.
a tempo, in regular time.
a tre, for three voices or instruments.
accelerando, gradually quickening the movement.
acciacatura, a species of grace-note.
accolade, the brace that binds all parts of a score.
accoppiate, parts joined by a brace.
adagio, slow and sustained.
adagio assai, very slow and sustained.
affetto, emotion, feeling.
afflizione, sorrow, mournfulness.
air ecossais, a Scotch air.
alla Polacca, in style of a Polish dance.
alla Siciliana, in style of Sicilian shepherd's dance.
alla zoppa, in constrained, halting, syncopated style.
allegro, quick, lively.
allegro assai, very quick.
allegro ma non troppo, quick, but not too much so.
allegretto, cheerful, but not so quick as allegro.
allegretto scherzando, moderately vivacious, playfully, but without haste.
al segno, dal segno, to return to the similar preceding sign and play thence to the word Fine.
alternativo, proceeding alternately from one to another movement.
andante, slow, gentle, soothing.
andante con moto, slow, but with movement, not dragging.
aria buffa, comic song.
aria d'abilita, song of difficult execution.
arpeggio, passages formed of the notes of regular chords, played in succession.

ben marcato, render passage or air in a clear, distinct and strongly accented manner.
bis, twice. Passage marked by a curved line under or over it to be played or sung twice.
bravura, boldness, spirit, dash, brilliancy.
brillante, brilliant, showy, sparkling.
brio, brilliancy, spirit.
brise, split into arpeggios; in violin playing, short, detached strokes of the bow.
buffo, buffa, humorous, comic, especially as applied to an air or a singer.
burden, a return of the theme of a song at the end of each verse.
burletta, a musical farce.

calore, warmth, animation.
cantabile, in singing style.
cantando, cantante, in singing style, smooth and flowing.
cantata, a vocal composition consisting of an intermixture of recitative, air and chorus.
capriccio, fanciful, irregular composition; caprice.
che, than, that.
coda, a "tail-piece," or concluding passage.
col arco, with the bow.
colla parte, accompanist must accommodate his temps to the leading part.
colla piu gran forza e prestezza, as loud and quick as possible.
come, as, like.
come primo, as at first.
come tempo del tema, same movement as the theme.
commodo, comodo, quietly, with composure.
con amore, tenderly, with affection.
con brio ed animato, brilliant and animated.
con diligenza, in studied manner.
con espressione, with expression.
con fuoco, with fire, with intense animation.
con gusto, with taste.
con impetuosita, with impetuosity.
con energia, with much energy.
con moto, with motion, actively, not dragging.
con spirito, with quickness, with spirit.
con variazioni, with variations.
con velocita, in swift time.
con vivacita, with animation.
contrapuntal, in the style of counterpoint, fugal, with rich and varied parts or voices.
counterpoint, the science of writing parts or melodies in combination.

crescendo, gradually increasing the tone-volume.

da capo, from the beginning, repeat from the beginning.
dal segno, from the sign, or mark of repetition.
decrescendo, gradual decreasing the tone volume.
delicato, delicatamente, delicately.
dito, the finger.
divertissement, short, light composition; also airs introduced between the acts of Italian opera.
divoto, in solemn style.
dolente, pathetically.
doloroso, in a soft, sorrowful style.

energico, with energy, force.
espressivo, with expression.

F

fine, end.
flebile, in mournful style, weepingly.
forte, loud.
fortissimo, very loud.
forza, with force, energy.
fresco, fresh, quick, lively.
furioso, furiously, with fire, energy, intense animation.

G

giusto, exact, precise.
glissando, in gliding manner, sweeping across the keys.
grazioso, gracefully.
Gregorian music, sacred compositions, after the style introduced into the Roman Catholic service by Pope Gregory about 600 A.D.).
gusto, taste.

H

harmonic triad, a common chord, like C-E-G, F-A-C, G-B-D. hauptsatz, the principal section of an extended movement.
hauptstimme, the most prominent voice, or part; the voice or part which has the theme.
haut-contre, counter-tenor, high tenor, alto.
haut-dessus, first treble, high soprano.
hinstrich, an up-bow.
holding-note, a note that is sustained or continued, while others are in motion.

I

il ponticello, in singing, where the natural tone forms a junction with the falsetto; the "break" in a voice.
impetuoso, with impetuosity.
impromptu, without study or preparation.
innocente, innocent, natural, unaffected, ingenuous.
instrumentation, the art of arranging music for the various instruments of an orchestra or band.

l. h., the left hand.
largamente, sustaining, or broadening the chords or tones, ponderously, with breadth.
larghetto, time less slow than largo.
larghissimo, very slowly and broadly.
largo, a very slow, stately movement.
legato, smooth, connected, the opposite of staccato.
leggiero, with lightness.
lento, slow.
lentando, with increasing slowness.

main droit, the right hand.
meno mosso, slower movement.
mesto, pensive, sad, melancholy.
mezza voce, with moderate strength of tone.
mezzo, half, middle.
mezzo forte, moderately loud.
mezzo piano, moderately soft.
mit begleitung, with accompaniment.
moderato, with moderation, as allegro moderato, moderately fast, not too fast.
molto adagio, very slow.
molto allegro, very fast.
mordent, a quick trill, with but a single stroke of the grace-note (side-note).
morendo, dying away, gradually growing softer. mormorando, with a gentle, murmuring sound.
motet, composition of a sacred character in several parts; an unaccompanied anthem.
motive, motivo, leading theme of a composition; a brief and characteristic theme.
musica di camera, chamber-music; music in serious style, intended for performance in a house or small hall—such as string-quartets, violin sonatas, piano trios, etc.

N

nachspiel, a postlude.
non troppo presto, not too fast.

obbligato, voices or instruments indispensable to the proper performance of a piece; also a part added for ornament or display.

opera buffa, a comic opera.
ottava, an octave.
ottava alta, an octave higher.
ottava bassa, an octave lower.

parte cantante, the singing part, the voice or part which has the sustained melody.
pastorale, in rustic or pastoral style.
perdendo or perdendosi, gradually decreasing in speed and volume to the last note, which is nearly, if not quite, lost on the ear.
piu forte, louder.
piu lento, slower.
piu mosso, with more movement.
piu piano, softer.
piu presto, quicker.
pizzicato, plucked, played with the finger, not with the bow.
poco a poco, gradually. By degrees.
poco meno, somewhat less.
poco piano, rather soft.
poco piu, somewhat more.
poco presto, rather quick.
portamento, gliding from one to another note.
premiere, a first performance.
prestissimo, the most rapid possible movement.
primo, the first.

rallentando, ritardando, ritenente, slackening the speed.
rondino, rondiletta, rondinetto or rondoletto, a short rondo.
rondo, a composition of several strains with frequent return to first theme.

scherzando, in a light, breezy manner.
scherzo, a joke or jest; the quick movement of a sonata or symphony.
seconda volta molto crescendo, much louder the second time.
segue il coro, here follows the chorus.
segue la finale, here follows the finale.
segue senza interruzione, go on; do not stop.
sempre forte, continuing loud, without decreasing the force.
sempre piu forte, steadily increasing in force.
senza replica, without repetition. Da capo senza replica, play from the beginning, but disregard repeat-marks.
sin al fine, to the end.
slentando, reducing the speed.
sostenuto, sustained.
sotto voce, in an undertone.
spiritoso, with spirit, animation, energy.
staccato, short, pointed, detached; the opposite of legato.
stark, loud.
syncopation, a displacement of accent, either by having a rest on a strong beat, or by tying a strongly accented tone to a weaker.

tasto solo, played without chords.
tempo, or a tempo, in time.
tempo, giusto, in exact time.
tempo primo, in the first or original time.
tenete sino alla fin del suono, keep keys down as long as sound lasts.
tenna, the theme.
tenuto, sustained; held for the full time-value.
timpani, kettle drums.
tutti, all voices or instruments, or both.
tre, three; a tre, for three voices or instruments.
tremando, or tremolo, rapid repetition of a note or chord, producing a tremulous kind of motion.

variazioni, variations of an air or theme. veloce, in rapid time.
vigoroso, vigorously, with energy.
vivace, with animation.
vivo, animated, lively.
voll, full, as mit volle orgel, full organ.
voce, the voice.
voce di petto, chest or natural voice.
voce di testa, head voice.
volta, time, turn; as prima volta, the first time; una volta, once.
volti subito, turn the leaf quickly.

DICTIONARY OF PHOTOGRAPHY

aberration, in a lens, a deviation of rays of light from a normal path. See chromatic aberration, spherical aberration.

accelerator, a chemical addition to a developer to hasten its work.

acetic acid, an acid used as a clearing bath for bromide prints, developed with ferrous oxalate.

acetone, a chemical compound used for preserving developers, fixing baths, and as a restrainer.

achromatic lens, one that produces an image without fringes of color.

actinometer, an instrument for measuring the intensity of the solar rays and determining the exposure for plates and papers.

adurol, a group of developing agents.

aerograph, an air-brush or spray pencil used in finishing enlargements, working up backgrounds, etc.

Albertype, a modification of the early paper-negative calotype process.

albumen process, one by which albumen is used instead of collodion to coat glass or paper.

ambrotype a negative on glass backed by a black coating, so that the transparent portions of the glass appear black.

anthrakotype, a process for producing line drawings, diagrams, etc.

aperture, the clear space in the lens which allows the light to pass into the camera.

Artigue process, an early gum-bichromate process, in which hot sawdust and water were used for developing.

artotype, another name of calotype.

astigmatism, an aberration in a lens.

astrophotography, photography applied to the celestial bodies.

autotype, the original carbon process.

backing, a non-reflecting substance applied to the back of a plate to prevent light from spreading.

Bergheim lens, one favored for portraiture.

biconcave lens, one thinnest at center, with both surfaces curved inwards.

biconvex lens, one thickest at center, with both surfaces curved outwards.

binocular camera, another name of stereoscopic camera.

biograph. See cinematograph.

bitumen process, a process used for obtaining a photographic image, from a negative on a zinc or copper plate, adapted to photo-lithography and line and half-tone zincography.

blue-print process, one in which prints are made on paper coated with a mixture of a ferrous salt, usually ammoniocitrate of iron, and ferricyanide of potassium, the image being developed and fixed by merely washing in water.

bromide paper, a paper coated with a sensitive gelatin-bromide emulsion, usually developed in a dark-room, but some kinds may be exposed and developed by gaslight.

cabinet, a size of portrait mount, about 6 x 4 inches.

calotype process, one in which paper, having on its surface chloride of silver, is exposed in a camera, and the image developed by a solution of gallic acid.

camera, a light-tight box in which the sensitive plate is exposed.

camera, solar, a camera in which the direct rays of the sun are used for printing and enlarging.

camera, stereoscopic, a camera with two similar lenses about $2\frac{3}{4}$ inches apart, for taking views for the stereoscope.

carbon paper, a paper coated with pigmented gelatin, usually sensitized with potassium bichromate.

carbon process, one in which the paper is coated with a mixture of gelatin, water, and pigment; sensitized by a solution of bichromate of potash or of ammonia; developed by washing in warm water; and printed under a negative.

celluloid, a compound of camphor and gun-cotton, resembling ivory; used in photography as a basis for flat and roll films.

chromatic aberration, the fringing of images with prismatic colors when light passes through curved lenses.

cinematograph, a device similar to the biograph, kinetograph, and vitascope, for projecting on a canvas screen lifelike animated pictures of moving objects.

collodion process, one in which the sensitive iodide and bromide of silver are held in a film of collodion, on glass, the image being developed with pyrogallic acid, or a ferrous salt, and the positive being obtained by laying the negative on prepared paper and exposing them to the light.

cyanotype process, the same as blueprint process, used chiefly for reproducing mechanical and architectural designs.

Daguerreotype process, the famous one in which a film of silver iodide on a plate of silvered copper was the sensitive material, the pictures on which being developed by the vapor of mercury.

developing paper, a paper on which the image does not immediately appear, but requires developing like the negative; similar to bromide paper.

development, the treatment of an exposed sensitive photographic surface with certain reducing agents, so as to render the image visible.

dry-plate, a sensitive gelatin or collodion plate that may be kept and exposed in a dry state. See wet-plate.

electrical transmission, a modern system of transmitting photographs electrically, employing a half-tone photograph printed on tinfoil, placed to be revolved on a metal drum over which travels an iridium stylus.

ferrotype, a negative on black-varnished iron.

film, a transparent, flexible sheet of celluloid, used in the place of glass as a base for the sensitive material.

fixing, the removal, by a solution of hyposulphite of soda or cyanide of potassium, of the unaffected deposit of iodide and bromide of silver in the collodion film after exposure and development.

flash-light, a light that can be made to flash into momentary brilliancy, used in instantaneous photography in dark places usually produced by compounds containing magnesium.

fuming, exposing silver paper to ammonia to render it more sensitive and capable of giving more brilliant prints and a purple tone.

halation, the tendency of the action of light to spread in the film. See aberration, chromatic aberration, spherical aberration.

heliotype process, a photo-mechanical method in which a gelatin picture is itself used to print from in some form of printing-press, instead of being covered with tinfoil, as in the Stannotype process.

I

intensifying, a term applied to various modes of giving strength or increased opacity to the deposit forming the photographic picture on an exposed and developed plate.

K

kinetograph. See cinematograph.

lens, a piece of a transparent substance, usually glass, so shaped as to afford two regular opposite surfaces, both curved, or one curved and the other plane, changing the direction of rays of light, and diminishing or increasing the apparent size of objects viewed through it; used to throw an image of the objects in front of the camera on to the sensitive plate.

lens field, the whole space illumined by a lens at full aperture, or the space it will cover with sufficient sharpness for photographic purposes.

litmus paper, white blotting paper stained blue in a litmus solution and dried; used for testing acids.

microphotography, a photographic process by which an object is reduced in size, while its exact form is retained.

N

negative, original plate or paper from which positive pictures are printed.

photochromograph, a photograph in which the colors are represented according to nature.

photochronograph, a chronographic and photographic apparatus combined, used for taking instantaneous pictures of moving objects at regular and usually short intervals.

photoengraving, a term applied to processes for producing printing blocks or plates by photography.

photographophone, a device for photographing sounds, speech, music, etc., and reproducing them by means of telephone receivers.

photography, the art of producing pictures by the action of certain sensitive substances, under the influence of light.

photogravure, a term applied to methods of producing, by photography, plates for printing on a copper-plate press.

photoheliograph, instrument devised for celestial photography.

photolithography, a mode of producing by photography designs upon stones, from which impressions may be obtained on an ordinary lithographic press.

photomicrography, the art of enlarging of microscopic objects, by means of the microscope, and projection of the enlarged image on a sensitized plate.

photo-sculpture, an application of photography to assist a sculptor in modelling portrait-statues, or facsimiles and reduced reproductions of other statues.

phototype process, one similar to the heliotype process.

platinum process, one in which the paper is coated with ferric and platinum salts, the resulting image being in platinum black.

positive, the print on paper from a negative.

powder process, one in which prints are produced on paper in plumbago.

printing-out paper, a paper on which the image appears at once on exposure to light under a negative, requiring only to be toned and fixed.

restrainer, any substance used in developing the images produced by light, to prevent the action from proceeding too violently.

rotogravure, printing from intaglio plates, illustrations or text, photographically transferred.

sensitizer, any substance added to a photographic material to increase or alter its sensitiveness to light.

silver paper, a paper formed by a coating of albumen solution containing ammonium chloride, on which, when dried, is floated a solution of silver nitrate.

spherical aberration, the deviation of rays of light when made to pass through curved lenses.

Stannotype process, one in which a gelatin picture is covered with tinfoil before being placed on a press for printing.

Swan's process, a carbon process believed to be the first of the permanent printing processes with pigmented gelatin that was commercially successful.

tintype, another name for ambrotype and ferrotype.

U

unar lens, a lens of large aperture, corrected for aberrations; used for rapid hand-camera work, portraiture, enlargements, and reproductions.

view-finder, a device attached to a camera through which an operator can see the view he is taking without using the focussing screen.

vitascope. See cinematograph.

water lens, a lens in which a cell of water or other liquid is used instead of glass.

wet-plate, a plate that requires sensitizing before using, and is used in a wet state. See dry-plate.

Woodburytype process, one similar to the Stannotype process for printing from a surface of tin.

X

X-ray photography, that which is done with the aid of Röntgen or X-rays; now invaluable in the practice of medicine and surgery.

DICTIONARY OF FORMS OF ADDRESS

1. Archbishop—Letters are addressed: "His Grace, the Lord Archbishop of——," and commence: "My Lord Archbishop." More formal documents are addressed "The Most Reverend Father in God (John Bird), by Divine Providence, Lord Archbishop of Canterbury"; other archbishops and suffragan bishops being "by Divine permission." When personally referred to, an archbishop is styled "Your Grace," not "Your Lordship." The Archbishop of Armagh is addressed as "His Grace the Lord Primate of Ireland."

Archbishop's wives, and other members of their families, as such, are without titles.

2. Baron—Addressed: "The Right Honorable Lord——"; referred to as "His Lordship," or "Your Lordship."

Baron's Daughter—"The Honorable Mary——"; or, if married, "The Honorable Mrs.——" Letters commence, "Madam."

Baron's Son—"The Honorable John ——." Letters commence, "Sir."

Baron's Son's Wife—"The Honorable Mrs.——." Letters commence, "Madam."

Baron's Wife, and Baroness in her own right— "The Right Honorable Lady——"; in strictness, but more commonly, "The Lady——." Letters commence, "Madam," and refer to her as "Your Ladyship."

Baronet—"Sir John——, Bart." Letters commence, "Sir."

Baronet's Wife—"Lady——." Unless she has a title as the daughter of a peer, no Christian name is used. She is referred to as "Your Ladyship."

Bishop—"The Right Reverend the Lord Bishop of——." Letters commence, "My Lord." Frequently the address is simply, "The Lord Bishop of——." The style in formal documents is, "The Right Reverend Father in God (John——), by Divine permission, Lord Bishop of——." Scotch bishops are addressed, "The Bishop of——," sometimes as "The Right Reverend Bishop (e.g., Henry Cotterell)," and letters commence, "Right Reverend Sir." The colonial bishops are addressed by their territorial titles like those of England.

Bishops' Wives and Children have no titles.

Countess—"The Right Honorable the Countess of——." Letters commence, "Madam," and refer to her as "Your Ladyship."

Duke—"His Grace the Duke of ——." Letters commence, "My Lord Duke"; and he is referred to as "Your Grace."

Duchess—"Her Grace the Duchess of ——." Letters commence, "Madam," and refer to her as "Your Grace."

Duke's Daughter—"The Right Honorable Lady Mary——," or less formally, "The Lady Mary——." Letters commence, "Madam," and refer to her as "Your Ladyship." If she is married to a person of inferior rank, her surname only is changed.

Duke's Eldest Son—Uses the second or some other title of his family by courtesy, and he is addressed as if he held the title by law, though in formal documents he is called "——, Esq., commonly called the Marquis or Earl" (as the case may be).

Duke's Younger Son—"The Right Honorable Lord John Russell," or less formally, "The Lord John R——," "My Lord," and "Your Lordship," Duke's Younger Son's Wife—"The Lady John——," unless where she has a title in her own right. "Madam," and "Your Ladyship."

Earl—"The Right Honorable the Earl of——," or less formally, "The Earl of——," "My Lord," and "Your Lordship."

Earl's Wife—see Countess.

Earl's Daughter—Like Duke's Daughter (q.v.).

Earl's Eldest Son is addressed as if the title which he holds in courtesy were a title in law.

Earl's Younger Son—Like Baron's Son (q.v.).

Earl's Younger Son's Wife—Like Baron's son's wife, unless of superior rank to her husband.

King—"The King's Most Excellent Majesty," "Sire," and "Your Majesty"; or, in less formal notes, thus: "Mr. Pill presents his duty to your Majesty."

Knight Bachelor—Like Baronet (q.v.), except that the word "Bart." is omitted.

Knight Bachelor's Wife—Like Baronet's Wife (q.v.).

Knight of the Garter—K.G. is added to the name or other title of the bearer.

Knight of St. Patrick—K.P. used in the same manner.

Knight of the Thistle—K.T.

Knight of the Bath—if a Knight Grand Cross, K.G.C.B.; if a Knight Commander, K.C.B.

Knight of the Bath's Wife—Like the wife of a Baronet or Knight Bachelor.

Lord Advocate (of Scotland)—"The Right Honorable the Lord Advocate" by courtesy; but in official documents he is styled "His Majesty's Advocate for Scotland." Letters ought strictly to commence, "Sir," not "My Lord," though the latter mode of address is usual.

Lord Lieutenant (of Ireland)—"His Excellency the Lord Lieutenant"; and letters commence in accordance with his rank in the peerage or otherwise. If a duke, he is styled "His Grace the Lord Lieutenant."

Lord Mayor—"The Right Honorable the Lord Mayor," "My Lord," and "Your Lordship." There are only three Lord Mayors—those of London, York, and Dublin.

Lord Provost—The Provost of Edinburgh is "The Right Honorable the Lord Provost"; of Glasgow, "The Honorable the Lord Provost"; of Perth and of Aberdeen, "The Lord Provost." There are no other Lord Provosts. Perhaps the distinction in the title of the chief magistrate of the Scottish capital is traceable to his having been always a member of the Privy Council of Scotland, at least since the Revolution.

Lord of Session (in Scotland)— "The Honorable Lord——," "My Lord," and "Your Lordship."

Lords of His Majesty's Treasury—These in their collective capacity are addressed as "The Honorable the Lords Commissioners of His Majesty's Treasury"; individually they have no title from their connection with the Treasury.

Maid of Honor—"The Honorable Miss"; and "Madam."

Marquis—"The Most Honorable the Marquis of——," not "The Most Noble." Letters commence, "My Lord Marquis"; but when personally addressed, he is styled "My Lord," and "Your Lordship."

Marchioness—"The Most Honorable the Marchioness of——," "Madam," and "Your Ladyship."

Marquis's Daughter—Like Duke's Daughter (q.v.).

Marquis's Eldest Son—Like Duke's Eldest Son (q.v.).

Marquis's Younger Son—Like Duke's Younger Son (q.v.).

Mayors—In formal documents, "The Right Worshipful the Mayor——"; but in letters, simply "The Mayor."

Members of Parliament—The letters M.P. are added to their usual address.

Officers in the Navy and Army—Their rank in the service, if above subalterns, is always prefixed to any other title they may possess, thus "Captain the Lord John——."

Prince—"His Royal Highness Prince——"; or "His Royal Highness the Duke of——," when the Prince is also a Duke. In practice, the initials H.R.H. are usually substituted for the words. A letter begins "Sir," not "My Lord Duke"; and the mode of reference is "Your Royal Highness."

Princess—"Her Royal Highness the Princess——," or "The Duchess" (as the case may be). "Madam," and "Your Royal Highness."

Prince's Wife, though of inferior rank, like a Princess by birth.

Privy Councillor—"The Right Honorable John——."

Privy Councillor's Wife and Children have no title.

Queen—"The Queen's Most Excellent Majesty." "Madam," and "Your Majesty"; or, "The Lord John R——presents his duty to your majesty."

Viscount—"The Right Honorable Lord Viscount——," or less formally, "The Lord Viscount," "My Lord," and "Your Lordship."

Viscountess—"The Right Honorable the Viscountess," or less formally, "The Viscountess," "Madam," and "Your Ladyship."

Viscount's Daughter—Like Baron's Daughter (q.v.).

Viscount's Son—Like Baron's Son (q.v.).

AMERICAN FORMS

The Constitution of the United States provides that no title of nobility shall be granted by the Government, and that no person holding any office of profit or trust under it, shall, without the consent of Congress, accept any title, etc., from any king, prince, or foreign state. The President of the United States and the Governor of Massachusetts are the only citizens possessing as officials a title by legislative act, and in both cases the word is "Excellency." Governors of other states are given the same title by courtesy. When either of these is addressed in writing or officially spoken of, the form is "His Excellency the President of the United States," or "His Excellency the Governor of ——"; and when spoken to "Your Excellency." Judges of federal, state, and municipal courts, members of both Houses of Congress, of state legislatures, and of the President's cabinet, and frequently members of municipal councils are addressed in writing by the courtesy title "Honorable," contracted to "Hon.," and in most cases the name of office follows that of the person, such as "Hon.——, U. S. Senate"; "Hon.——, Chief Justice of the (Supreme Court of the) United States"; "Hon.——, M.C." Associate Justices of the U. S. Supreme Court and of state, supreme, and superior courts, are addressed in writing with "Hon.," name, and name of office, but spoken of as "Mr. Justice——." Officers of the army and navy are addressed in writing by name followed with title of highest rank attained, and, if in command of a military division, naval squadron on station, or on the retired list, by designation of the fact, such as "——Major General, U.S.A., commanding military division of the Atlantic"; "—— Rear-Admiral, U.S.N., commanding Atlantic Squadron"; "—— General U.S.A. Retired." All official communications of the Government begin "Sir," and close "Respectfully."

Recipients of regular and honorary degrees should be addressed in writing by name, followed by abbreviation of degree in the order A.B., A.M., Ph.D., M.D., D.D., LL.D. A physician or surgeon is spoken of and to as "Dr. ——"; clergyman is addressed in writing and spoken of usually as "The Rev. ——," spoken to as "Mr. ——"; if a doctor of divinity he may be addressed in writing as "——, D.D.," or "The Rev.——, D.D.," and spoken to and of as "Dr. ——." A Roman Catholic cardinal is addressed in writing and spoken of as "His Eminence ——, Cardinal (Bishop, Priest, or Deacon) according to rank, of the Holy Roman Church," and spoken to as "Your Grace"; an archbishop and bishop may be similarly addressed as "The Most Rev. —— D.D., Archbishop of ——," and "The Right Rev. ——, D.D., Bishop of ——." In the Protestant Episcopal Church, bishops are addressed the same as in the Roman Catholic Church; and in the Methodist Episcopal Church, as "The Rev. Bishop ——, D.D."

Foreign ambassadors to the United States are addressed officially by the titles recognized in their own countries, and if they have no title as "Mr. ——," followed with title of office; and U. S. ambassadors to foreign countries, officially as "Mr.," otherwise "Hon.——." Some grades of lawyers as well as justices of the peace are addressed in writing and spoken of in legal documents as "—— Esq.," and any gentleman may be similarly addressed, though "Mr. ——" is preferable. "Social custom adds the titles of various officials to the names of their wives when used in introductions or conversation: Mrs. President ——, Mrs. Justice ——, Mrs. Governor ——, but the usage does not extend to daughters. The disposition on the part of the Government and the most cultured citizens is to ignore titles as far as propriety will permit.

It is to be noted that in British titles, unlike those in vogue in the Unites States, the form "honorable" is customarily used. In the United States it is not considered good form to use abbreviations of titles on letters, though it is allowable to do so on envelopes. Where there are several daughters in a family, the eldest one is addressed as "Miss" without her Christian name, as "Miss Brown"; the others are addressed by their full names, as "Miss Mary Brown," etc. A father and son of the same Christian names are addressed with the addition of "Sr." and "Jr." respectively, to the family name, as "Mr. Frank Jones, Sr." and "Mr. Frank Jones, Jr." If the father dies before the son, the latter drops the distinguishing addition. Some families, clinging to a given Christian name, use the form "George Shiras" or "George Shiras, 1st" for the father; "George Shiras, 2d," for a son; and "George Shiras, 3d," for a grandson, with any title either may rightfully use.

DICTIONARY OF SYNONYMS AND ANTONYMS

A Collection of Common Words of Like and Opposite Meaning for Study and Comparison

An intensely interesting study in philology and one that is too commonly overlooked is afforded by a large group of words that is divisible into two classes, first, different words that have the same meaning, and, second, words that have a meaning entirely opposite to those in the first class. A practical result of a comparison of these classes of words is found in a choice suitable to the fancy of the student, and also in the selection of the words that indicate the best form in writing and speaking. Any one who wants "the right word" will here be accommodated. Words in the first class are known as Synonyms; those in the second class as Antonyms. Should the student wish to pursue this study further two other classes are available and inviting, first, Homonyms, or words similar in spelling but differing in use, and, second, Homophonous words, or those that are similar in sound, but differ in spelling and meaning.

The following collection is limited to synonyms and antonyms, and to those especially that are most prevalent in ordinary usage, and will answer most of the requirements of refined correspondence and conversation.

DICTIONARY OF EVERYDAY ERRORS

Compiled and Revised by FARQUSON JOHNSON

CONSULTING EDITOR OF THE NEW UNIVERSITIES DICTIONARY, AUTHOR OF USES AND ABUSES OF OUR AMERICAN LANGUAGE

Too few of us are given to calling the attention of others to errors in speech or in writing when we hear or see them. Indeed too few of us correct our own errors, even when we are aware of them. We easily fall into the habit of talking carelessly—and the way of human nature seems to be not to break itself of a habit, either good or bad.

The logical place to begin in the correction of errors of speech is at home, and at the age of infancy. From the time the child begins to talk, it never again is too young to be taught correctly. It is then that the bad habits of careless talking are formed, and unfortunately the parents seldom realize the necessity of correcting them and discouraging the habit.

To the contrary, mispronunciation and errors of grammar more often are encouraged in children by their thoughtless elders. Callers are expected to witness such exhibits by the proud parents as "Where are the kittens, darling?" "They has went," answers baby. "Ain't that cute?" will say the adoring mother—not realizing the difficulties some teacher will have in after years, trying to break the youngster of the "has went" habit.

"Wich" for "which," "brung" for "brought," "taint" for "it is not," and "dese," "dose," and "dem" for "these," "those," and "them," are only a few of the very many errors carelessly picked up in childhood. Quite often these errors become habitual because they are not corrected at home, where they are used more than in any other place. In some instances the parents have been known to acquire the same careless style of speaking, which, of course, further encourages the child in the habit, and the reign of everyday errors in our language goes merrily on.

How to Correct Your Own Errors

Among our associates, in the home or at business, we should make it a practice to call attention to errors of speech. By no other method could we so readily learn to speak correctly. It soon would become a matter of pride as to who would make the fewest errors. Not only those who practised it, but the children also would benefit largely by such a custom.

The purpose of this section of the dictionary is to call attention to some of the more common errors in writing and speaking, and to point out the proper way to correct them. This is an unusual feature for a volume of this nature, and should be welcomed by all of those who experience difficulties with our language.

As has already been said, errors in spelling, pronunciation, and in the choice of words are due to ignorance or carelessness. There is no valid excuse for either. With all of the educational advantages at hand nobody truthfully can offer lack of opportunity as a reason for ignorance; and with all of the free schools—both night and day—lack of funds is no longer a reasonable excuse for not learning to read, write, and speak correctly, at least.

To those who wish to avoid common errors—to those who would gain more knowledge—to those who desire to improve their style of speech—an opportunity is here presented. When carefully reading this section one should at all times refer to the main body of this valuable dictionary for the comparison of different words and their variants, as the preceding vocabulary is replete with all of the defined words that will be required for use in almost any walk of life.

The aim of the compiler of the following section, however, has been to make it complete also. Yet he has been limited to the selection of only those words that are more likely to be misspelled, mispronounced, or misunderstood by those who are careless or who have not taken advantage of their educational opportunities.

No attempt has been made to follow the words, the forms, or the rules carried out by the vocabulary editor of this dictionary, as this section is to be considered entirely apart from the main vocabulary—and each is designed to serve its purpose independently.

An Easy Method for Readers

The compiler of this section has endeavored to refrain from giving a choice o pronunciations, or meanings—so far as possible, to those words regarding which there is a difference of opinion by authorities. It is the writer's belief that there should be, and that there is, only one correct way to pronounce any word, and that disputed points of this character should be decided by a federal commission, duly appointed or elected to serve such a purpose. Unfortunately sufficient interest is lacking in educational subjects, and doubtless the bickerings of self appointed authorities will go on to the end of time.

As will be seen by the close observer, this is not a technical section. It was not compiled for the use of those who quibble with the so called niceties of the English language; but as the title implies, it is designed to cover the everyday errors of our language which one too often hears at home and in the workshop, and which one receives in one's mail. It will prove helpful to those who are so sorely in need of it.

As an article, this letter is used when the word following it begins with a consonant, or one taking that sound.

Often the entire sense is changed by this one little letter, as a black and white cat is one animal; a black and a white cat must be two. The article should always be repeated before an adjective that qualifies a distinct thing. In the sentence "He has a little money," the meaning is positive; but on omitting the article, "He has little money," the meaning becomes negative.

a, an. An should not be used before any aspirated h, such as a heroic, a historical, etc., not an heroic, an historical. Use an only before a vowel or silent h.

abbreviate. Words may be abbreviated but not speeches, which are abridged.

abortive. Improperly used to express failure, as in "an abortive trip." It is properly used only of that which has not been borne in full time or is immature.

above. Expressions such as "the above statement," "according to the above," though common in use, are not sanctioned by the best authority. "The foregoing, or preceding statement" is preferred. "The above-mentioned" is permissible.

Above should not be used for "more than." "Above a mile" is not correct.

abridge. See definition of this word and "abbreviate" in the regular vocabulary of this dictionary.

accept of. We may accept presents, not "accept of" them, "of" being superfluous.

accident. Often misused for wound. "Accident" implies something that takes place independently of our intentions. A wound may or may not be an accident.

ac'curate. Not ak'ret. The three syllables should be distinctly pronounced.

acknowledgment. No e is required after the g, which is a common error.

acme. To be distinguished from climax, an ascending gradation, while acme is the last, highest, or best of a series. Thus the two words are not synonyms, though often so used.

acoustics. Acoustics is, not are. The pronunciation is a-koos'tiks, according to almost universal usage, although authorities differ.

ad. A common trade abbreviation of advertisement, to be avoided in careful writing or speaking. "Ad" has achieved considerable commercial vogue, however, and is almost exclusively used in what may be termed the inside of the advertising profession and in business pertaining to it.

address. Both the noun and the verb should be accented on the last syllable.

adjective and adverb. Adjectives like previous, subsequent, and independent are often improperly used in place of adverbs, as in "previous to your coming," where "previously" should be used.

"He looks bad," though at first sight inelegant if not incorrect, is proper, as are "to drink deep," "to stand erect," etc.

Adjectives also have a proper adverbial use in such phrases as "pale green," "red hot," etc., where the first adjective qualifies the second.

admit of. The meanings of "admit" and "admit of" are different, as seen in the sentence, "that the door admits to the house does not admit of argument."

adobe. This Spanish word should be pronounced in three syllables, the second syllable slightly accented: a-do'be, short a; long o and e.

adult. Pronounce a-dult', not ad'ult.

advantage. Sometimes erroneously used for benefit. Compare these two words in the vocabulary section of this dictionary.

advent. Should not be used for a simple arrival. To speak of "the advent of the coal man" robs the term of its stateliness and dignifies a common domestic event unnecessarily. An important, stately, or sacred arrival may be properly termed an advent.

advertisement. Should not be accented on the third, but on the second syllable; pronounced ad-ver'tis-ment.

a few. This phrase, though objected to by some writers, is supported by good authority, the adjective becoming a noun and standing for "part of the whole." "Quite a few" should be avoided.

affect. See effect.

again, against. Pronounced agen′, agenst′, with the sound of short e. The usual sound of ai is that of long a, but again, against, said, saith, etc., are exceptions.

aggravate. Should not be used for irritate, anger, vex, or provoke, having an entirely different meaning. To aggravate is to make worse or more burdensome. Thus, "his guilt was aggravated by the circumstances of the crime." It is not correct to say that persons are aggravated.

aggregate. Often used in the sense of "amount to," as in "The prizes aggregate $100." Aggregate means primarily to bring together, to collect into a mass, which is distinct from "amount to"; the use of the word in the latter sense is objected to by some authorities.

ailment. Pronounce the last syllable ment, not munt. Be careful with all such terminals, ment, sent, ence, ant, ent, ness, etc., and avoid pronouncing them munt, sunt, unce, unt, etc.

ain't. Not a proper contraction of am not or are not. Neither ain't nor 'tain't should ever be used. The phrases "he ain't," or "'tain't" are meaningless.

allege. Should not be used where the word say answers the purpose. What is alleged tends to criminate or exculpate. The synonyms of allege are adduce, assign, and advance.

all of. Such phrases as "all of them, both of them" are commonly used, but the best speakers and writers regard "of" as superfluous. Instead of "I have all of them," say "I have them all." "Take all of it" should be "Take it all."

allow. Often misused for think, say, or admit, as "He allows you are old," "she allowed she was mistaken." Such usage is incorrect.

all right. The tendency of common usage is to contract this expression into the one word alright, but it always should be two words.

allude. Should never be used in the sense of "speak of," which is not its true signification. To allude to a person is to hint delicately at him without direct mention. It is less direct than "refer," which may involve naming the person or thing.

almost. Should not be confused with "nearly," the two adverbs being distinct in meaning. We say correctly "almost sick with hunger," but "nearly fell off the bridge." The idea expressed by "almost" is nearness to an end; "nearly" expresses nearness to an unforeseen event.

alone. Often improperly used for only. To be alone is to be unaccompanied. "only" conveys the idea of there being no other. When there is one man only on the street, he is the sole male individual present, but there might be many men alone.

also. Pronounce as spelled, not alt′so as is so often heard. Be careful not to use this word too often in writing and speaking.

aluminum, aluminium. Both forms are still in use, manufacturers favoring the former and chemists the latter. Sir Humphrey Davy, who proposed the word, made it originally alumium and later aluminum.

always. Pronounced awl′wayz, not awl′wuz. To be preferred to "ever" in prose diction in the sense of "for all time."

amateur. Mispronounced am′a-choor; should be am′a-tur, with a slight stress (due to its French origin) on the last syllable, with the long sound of u.

among one another. It is not correct to say "they exchanged confidences among one another." "With one another" or "among themselves" are correct.

anchovy. Sometimes mispronounced an-ko′vy; should be an-cho′vy.

and. "Come and see me" should be "come to see me." The wrong use of "and" in such cases is very common. It is permissible only when two distinct acts are involved by the verbs, and should never be used as a substitute for the infinitive.

And is sometimes used improperly for "or"; as, "a language like the Greek and Latin." There being no such single language, the phrase should be "the Greek or the Latin."

And is sometimes misused to introduce a relative clause where no conjunction is needed; thus, "He has a spirit proud as Lucifer, and which no test can break." Omit and.

A common error of speech is the omission of the sound of d in and. Proper pronunciation of the d is imperative.

another from. Incorrectly used for "another than."

anticipate. Should not be used for expect and foresee. It is correct to say "My attempt was anticipated by another" (who made the attempt first) but not "His death was anticipated."

antipodes. Properly pronounced in four syllables, an-tip′o-deez, though the singular is in three, an′ti-pode.

anxious. Misused when "desirous" would better express the meaning. We may be "anxious" about our health, but not "anxious" to dine or to sleep. Friends are properly "anxious" for news of travelers in a railroad wreck, but are not "anxious" about keeping appointments. Remember that "anxious" means full of anxiety, suffering from suspense, which will tend to prevent misuse of the word.

any. Often improperly used for "at all," as in "He cannot swim any," "She does not learn any." Such usage should be avoided. "He is not any better" is permissible, though most writers prefer "no" to "not any."

anyhow, anyway. These colloquialisms appear to be strongly intrenched in American speech, though objected to by certain writers. In formal diction they are replaced by "in any event, at any rate," etc.

any manner of means. Used improperly for "any means." It is a redundancy, owing a certain popularity to its alliterativeness.

any place. "Are you going any place?" should be "Are you going anywhere?"

anyways, anywheres. Unnecessary variants of anyway, anywhere.

apt. Frequently misused for likely and liable. "He is apt to fall" should be "He is liable to fall," or "likely to fall." Apt is correctly used when the meaning to be conveyed is "inclined or disposed customarily."

appreciate. A common error is to "appreciate a person highly," which is an impossibility, since to appreciate is to set a true value on, to estimate justly. In the sentence quoted "esteem" should be substituted for "appreciate."

The word is also now used with the meaning "to rise or increase in value" and is widely applied to prices of commodities, real estate, etc. In this sense it is the opposite of "depreciate," and this use is well established.

apprehend. Do not confuse this word with comprehend, as is so often done. Look up these words in the main vocabulary of this dictionary and compare their meanings.

approach. Incorrectly used to mean to address, petition, or appeal to, as in "The policemen approached the council for more pay," which should be "petitioned."

Approach is being used to imply bribery or underhand methods; as, "Meanwhile the senators were approached by a powerful lobby." One can approach a subject by suggesting it, or approach a person in any sense involving bodily proximity.

aqueduct. Be sure to sound the final t in pronouncing this word. So many times it is erroneously omitted by those who should know better.

Arab. Pronounced Ar'ab, not A'rab.

arabic. Mispronounced a-ra'bic. Should be ar'a-bic.

arctic. The first hard c sound is often wrongly omitted. The proper pronunciation is ark'tik.

area. Pronounced a're-a, not a'ri.

aren't. Colloquial contraction of "are not," but undesirable.

argue. Should be distinguished from dispute. To dispute is to disagree. To argue is to adduce reasons. We may dispute a bill, but do not argue it.

Argue is properly used in the sense of manifesting by inference; to imply.

Arkansas. Mispronounced Ar-kan'zas. It is Ar'kan-saw according to the law of that State.

arraign. Prepositions are often wrongly used with this verb. A man is not arraigned at a court, but in a court, at the bar, before a judge, on indictment, for crime, upon his arrest.

articles. In every sentence clearness of meaning is the first requisite. Too much attention cannot be paid to the correct use of articles, upon which the meaning often depends. "The president sent for the secretary and treasurer" may mean that he sent for one or two persons. If two persons are intended, all ambiguity would be removed by saying "the secretary and the treasurer."

artist. A much-abused word with which the "doctor" and the "professor" can sympathize. Properly applied to those who practice the fine arts, its use has been commonly extended to include "artists" in hair dressing, on the tightrope, and at the soda fountain, and the bootblack "artist" may be found in the "artist" barber's shop. The original artists now prefer to be called painters, sculptors, etc., rather than share the glory of the term with its modern claimants.

as . . . as so . . . as. The former is used in affirmative statements—"I am as good as he," the latter in negative propositions—"She is not so young as you." This distinction, however, is too frequently overlooked.

So . . . as, in negative sentences, conveys an impression that one of the persons or things compared possesses some characteristic in a considerable degree, as in the sentence, "Mary is not so good looking as John." Here it is implied that John has a high degree of good looks. This suggestion is lacking when as . . . as are used.

as far as. Used interchangeably with "so far as," except that the latter prevails when emphasis is to be laid upon the degree or extent implied in the phrase. The rule applies also to as great as, as long as, as soon as, etc.

aside. Sometimes misused for apart. Prof. J. S. Blackwell writes, "Aside, in the sense of separately, as a subject of thought, is an Americanism, and is unknown and altogether unexemplified in correct and classical English." In spite of which Dr. William Mathews boldly uses "aside" and says: "Words have a potency of association aside from their significance as representative signs."

asperse. Often confounded in meaning and use with detract, defame, slander, and calumniate. "Asperse" has a meaning all its own; it fixes a moral stain on the character. If we speak slightingly of our neighbor, we asperse him, though we may not defame, slander, or calumniate him. The correct use of "aspersion" is seen in the words of Steele: "Let those who may be apt to raise aspersions upon our family please to give us an impartial account of their own, and we shall be satisfied."

astonish. Do not confuse this word with surprise. When Mrs. Blank discovered her son taking a glass of milk from the cupboard late at night, she said she was surprised. Having studied the dictionary, he replied, "No, you are astonished; I'm surprised." Look up the definition of these words in this dictionary.

at and in. "At" is less definite than "in" and may indicate mere proximity to a place. It is proper to use "at" before the names of small towns, foreign cities far remote, and houses. "In" should be used before the names of the great geographical or political divisions of the globe, countries and large cities; as, "He teaches in Paris; she sings in New York." "At" should be used before the number of a street and "in" or "on" before the name of the street; as "The officer was found at 427 Jay Street." "At" and "in" may often be used interchangeably, as, "He was born in or at Paris." "At" is used after the verb touch; as, "The vessel touched at Queenstown." Either may be used after the verb arrive; as, "They arrived at or in Liverpool."

In the phrase, "Where am I at?" born in Congress, "at" is redundant and unnecessary.

"In the South" is to be preferred to "at the South," though there is authority for the latter. Say, "He is at home," not "to" home—a common error.

at all. This phrase is unobjectionable, though usually superfluous. "I saw no birds at all" would suffer no loss by the deletion of "at all," but the latter phrase is sometimes a convenient addition and is used by some writers.

at auction. In England they say "by auction," but in America we say "at private sale" and "at auction." Johnson says, "the verb auction means to sell by auction," that is, by offering to the highest bidder. "At an auction" and "at a private sale" are common and correct expressions.

at length, at last. The difference in meaning between these two phrases often escapes all but the most careful speakers. "At last" implies difficulties overcome, impediments causing unforeseen delay, or disappointment by having had to wait longer for an object than we expected. "At length" is not necessarily final, but implies long continuance of effort, mental or physical, for a definite end, or long-continued hope, expectation, suspense or suffering. "At length his wishes were realized and he went to Europe." "At last he died."

at you. Not "mad at you," but "angry with you," will correct two common errors.

attache. Although this is purely a French word, we have adopted it for want of a better one. Pronounced a-ta-shay, with the first two a's short, and last a long; only slight accent on last syllable.

auxiliary. Pronounced aug-zil'ya-ri, not auks'il-ary.

avenue. Often mispronounced av'noo or av'e-noo; should be av'e-new.

avocation. To be distinguished from vocation, which should be used of a man's daily business or calling in life, while his avocation is his recreative employment, or, it may be, his hobby. Thus we say correctly, "The law is his vocation, politics his avocation"; "Her vocation is teaching, her avocation pyrography." As Alfred Ayres clearly puts it, "Our avocations are the things we do for the love of doing them; our vocations are the things we do for gain." The two words are frequently confounded, but careful speakers will avoid the error.

awful, awfully. Colloquialisms that grate upon the ear in such phrases as "awfully good," "an awful headache," and "Thanks awfully!" Their use, even when regarded as slang, is always in poor taste, and generally betokens a limited vocabulary.

The common misuse of such strong words as "awful" results unfortunately in lessening their strength and value for legitimate use. There is surely nothing awe-inspiring about the ordinary social bore, but he is flippantly and frequently called "an awful bore," which robs the word "awful" of its significance when properly applied to a truly awe-inspiring spectacle. To speak of an artesian well as "an awful bore" would be a correct use of the word, but would cause smiles instead of wonder or admiration, simply because of the widespread misuse of "awful." Careful speakers will scrupulously avoid such misuse of awful, terrible, horrible, and similar words.

aye. Two distinct pronunciations of this word are sanctioned. When it signifies "yes," or a vote in the affirmative, it is pronounced as long i; when it means "always, ever," the pronunciation is that of long a.

bachelor. A very common abbreviation of this word is bach; not used by good speakers or writers.

back. Should not be used with "return," which includes the sense of back. "He will return back home" is an example of frequent misuse.

bacillus. Pronounced ba-sil'us. The plural of this word, "bacilli," is often misused for the singular form.

backward, backwards. The former may be used as either an adjective or an adverb, the latter is a variant form of the adverb. We speak correctly of "a backward pupil," and we retire either backward or backwards, according to individual preference, both forms being used by good writers. There is a tendency to drop the final s in all such adverbs.

bad. Misused in such cases as "a bad cold, a bad wound," where severe or dangerous is the proper word. As one writer pertinently asks, "Inasmuch as colds are never good, why should we call them bad?"

bade. The a is short, bad; not baid.

badly. "I want to see you badly" should be "I want to see you very much." Similarly with "We miss you badly." The use of badly in such cases is undesirable.

baggage. The word is seldom used in speech in England, where "luggage" takes its place. The best English writers, however, are now using "baggage," and it is etymologically the better word. "Luggage" is perhaps better suited to the conditions existing in Europe, where travelers continue to "lug" their baggage, in the absence of many conveniences of transportation here.

balance. Frequently and erroneously used for rest, remainder. Balance is the excess of one thing over another, that which will make them balance, and should only be used in this sense. "The balance of the evening" is not only wrong but ridiculous, like "The balance of the guests stayed late." "Rest" or "remainder" are easily and properly substituted.

"Balance" is correctly used of accounts, in referring to the difference between the debits and the credits, or the sum needed to balance an account.

balm. Pronounced bahm, not bam.

banister, banisters. Used colloquially for baluster and balustrade, which are preferred in formal speech and writing, on the ground of etymological correctness. Banister is simply a corruption of the old word baluster. Common usage has given it a certain standing of authority.

banquet. Pronounced bang'kwet, not ban'kwet. Too often erroneously used when "dinner" or even "supper" would be more appropriate. "Banquet" should be used only of a formal and sumptuous repast of large proportions.

baptism. Pronounced as two syllables, bap'tizm; not three, bap'tiz-um, nor two, bab'tizm.

be. To be grammatically correct, the case of an apposite personal pronoun following the verb "to be" should agree with its subject. We should always say, "It is I, you are he," not "It is me, you are him." Colloquial exceptions are frequent, but the rule is plain and should be strictly observed.

beastly. An English colloquialism occasionally heard in America. "Beastly weather" is a single example of phrases used by people of all classes in England, but regarded in the United States as coarse. "Beastly drunk" is said by some writers to be defensible, while by others it is regarded as a libel on the beasts.

beat. Do not use this word for the more expressive word "defeat."

be back. "I'll be here again," "I'll return," or "I'll come back again," are all preferable to "I'll be back," a common colloquialism which should be avoided.

been to. Pronounce been, bin, short i. The "to" is superfluous in "where have you been to?" "Been to home" should be "Been at home."

begin, commence. The preference should always be given to the former, though the two words have the same meaning. "Begin" is of Anglo-Saxon origin and is the better word. The use of "commence" is often evidence of affectation.

"The same persons," says Godfrey Turner, "who habitually discard the word 'many' when they have a chance of glorying in 'numerous' have concurred in giving the cold shoulder to 'begin.' . . . 'Directly I commence to speak, every one commences to look at me,' said a mincing miss at a suburban 'at home.' There are mincing misses of the male sex in authorship who are always 'commencing to.' Female authors are seldom caught at this feminine weakness of phrase."

"In the beginning" God made heaven and earth. Note the weakness of a change to "In the commencement."

According to Crabb, "begin" is opposed to end, "commence" to complete. A person begins a thing with a view of ending it; he commences a thing with a view of completing it. Begin is used for either things or persons, commence for persons only. A word begins with a particular letter, a man commences his career.

beginner. It is incorrect and displays ignorance to speak of "a new beginner." A beginner cannot be anything but new to his work. Omit the "new."

being. Many writers have labored strenuously to prove the illegitimacy of the expression "is being," as in "The house is being built," but it is now well established, and appears to have filled a void.

"Is being" first appeared as an English passive, corresponding to the progressive form in the active voice, late in the 18th or early in the 19th century, and gained currency chiefly through the newspaper press. Its opponents, who were many, argued that it was pure invention; that there is no progressive form of the verb "to be," and no need of it; hence, that there is no such expression in English as "is being." They pointed to the following among other examples of literary usage:

"The books are selling."—Allen's Grammar.

"The fortress was building."—Washington Irving.

"An attempt is making in the English Parliament."—Daniel Webster.

"The church now erecting in the city of New York."—North American Review.

These quotations are of interest as showing the void—the need now supplied by "is being," which was characterized by the grammarian Goold Brown as "one of the most absurd and monstrous innovations ever thought of." Another writer said that "is being done" was "a new-fangled and most uncouth solecism, substituted for the good old English idiom 'is doing'—an absurd periphrasis driving out a pointed and pithy turn of the English language."

Richard Grant White devoted many pages of his interesting work, "Words and Their Uses," to his protest against "is being," which, said he, "about seventy or eighty years ago began to affront the eye, torment the ear, and assault the common sense of the speaker of plain and idiomatic English." He concludes that "it can hardly be that such an incongruous and ridiculous form of speech as 'is being done' was contrived by a man who, by any stretch of the name, should be included among grammarians."

In spite of these fulminations of the learned and the conservative, the locution "is being" came to stay. At first regarded as an awkward neologism, usage has accustomed and even reconciled us to it, and the imperfects passive, "is being built, is being done," etc., pass unquestioned in modern English and American literature. Indeed Dr. Fitzedward Hall has shown that such compound participial forms have been used by good writers on both sides of the Atlantic for more than a century. "The deviser of our modern imperfects passive," says Dr. Hall, "is, more than likely, as undiscoverable as the name of the valiant antediluvian who first tasted an oyster."

As early as 1795 Robert Southey wrote of "a fellow whose uttermost upper grinder is being torn out by the roots by a mutton-fisted barber," and Charles Lamb speaks of "a man who is being strangled." Many of the best of living writers employ "is being" freely, and having regard for the logic of facts the conclusion must be reached that the once obnoxious neologism has firmly established itself in the English language and its literature. This does not, however, deny the right of the modern speaker to say "the house is building" if he prefers that locution to "is being built."

A pronounced difference is seen between such phrases as "is growing" and "is being grown," the one indicating development from within and the other the watchful care of the husbandman. "Is feeding" and "is being fed" further illustrate the difference of signification.

belong. "Do you belong?" is a common colloquialism used when the subject of conversation is of some particular organization, etc. Regarded as a colloquialism, and as elliptical—"to the society, etc." being understood, there is little to urge against this absolute use of "belong." Some writers, however, think it objectionable.

belongings. An old English word recently restored to good usage after a period of disuse. Sometimes applied by the head of a family to the members dependent on him.

beside, besides. These words are interchangeable in the meanings of over and above, distinct from, although besides is more frequently used in this sense; as, "There were learned men besides these." Beside means by or at the side of, on one side of; as, "He sat beside me." Also, aside from, apart from, or out of; as, "Paul, thou art beside thyself."

Besides specially means moreover, in addition; as, "Besides, the gentleman is married."

Generally speaking, it may be said that the tendency of present usage is to use "beside" only as a preposition with the original meaning, by the side of, or with the cognate meaning, aside from, out of; while "besides" is used in the adverbial sense (moreover) and in the remaining prepositional sense.

bestial. Often mispronounced. Should be best'yal, with short e.

be that as it will. Should be "be that as it may."

better. Erroneously used for "more" in phrases like "better than a mile," which is incorrect.

between. Often misused for among. It is strictly applied only to two things, parties, or persons, while among is used in reference to a greater number. We say, "Between James and John," but "Among the apostles."

In expressing contrast or opposition, however, "between" may be correctly used in speaking of more than two; as "The three women are friends, though there is a great difference between their ages."

bid. We should "bid a man go," not bid him "to" go.

big. Frequently misused for great or large, and better applied to the lower animals than to men.

"Great" is applied to all kinds of dimensions in which things can grow or increase; "large" is properly applied to space, extent, and quantity; "big" denotes great as to expansion or capacity. "Big" may be justified in great girth—a big man, but "large" is preferable to denote tallness and size in proportion. "Great" is used of men's reputation, character, or attainments. Abraham Lincoln was both a large and a great man, but it would be inelegant if not incorrect to say that he was a big man.

A house, a room, a heap, a pile, an army, etc., is great or large; an animal or a mountain is great or big; a road, a city, a street, etc., is termed great, rather than large. We speak correctly of "an event big with the fate of nations."

birth. Look up the difference between this word and berth in the main vocabulary of this dictionary.

bit. An old word for a small piece of anything, and often used absolutely, as "There are several bits in the collection to delight an artist." Often used in phrases expressive of extent or degree, as "a bit older, or wiser." Though sometimes regarded as a colloquialism, the word is of ancient and accepted usage.

black, blacken. Not to be used indiscriminately. We black boots, but blacken reputations.

blame it on. A gross and improper expression. We may blame a person "for" an offense, or lay blame "on" him, but to "blame it on" is not even excusable slang. It is sometimes used by persons of whom better things might be expected.

blatant. Should be pronounced with the first a long. Perhaps the slang word blah, a as in far, came from the word "blatant."

blessed. The adjective is pronounced bles'ed, the participle blest.

blowhard. Not a refined term, and should be replaced by boaster when speaking of one who boasts.

boatswain. The only pronunciation recognized by boatswains themselves is bo'sn.

both. Frequently misused with absurd effect, as in "They both met at dinner." "They both resemble each other." In such cases it is a simple redundancy; also in the following examples: "He holds the offices of both the secretary and the treasurer," "He lost all his property—both houses, lands, and ready money."

Do not say "John and James both are here," but "Both John and James, etc."

In negative sentences "both" is sometimes so used that the meaning is obscured; thus, "Both candidates were not elected." Was either of them elected, or were they both defeated? Such sentences require reconstruction to make their meaning clear.

both alike. In this connection "both" is misused. It may be used with like, but not correctly with alike. "They are both alike" is improved by omitting "both," while the following sentence is correct: "Both children are like their mother."

bound. A colloquialism in the sense of determined, as in "We are bound to go to the theater," or with the meaning of sure, certain, as in "Children are bound to play." This use has been called by some modern writers a barbarism.

Bourbon. Pronounced bur'bon in Kentucky; boor'bun when applied to the island and dynasty.

brace. See score.

brand new. Pronounce the d in brand. Many writers and speakers erroneously omit it, bran new.

brethren. Often mispronounced breth'er-en. It should be two syllables only, breth'ren.

bring, fetch, carry. Erroneously used as interchangeable, and care should always be taken in discriminating between them.

To bring is simply to take with oneself from the place where one is; to fetch is to go first to a place and then bring a thing; whatever is near at hand is brought; whatever is at a distance must be fetched: the porter at a hotel brings a parcel, a boy who is sent for it fetches it. Bring always respects motion toward the place in which the speaker resides; fetch, a motion both to and from; carry, always a motion directly from the place or at a distance from the place. A servant brings the parcel home which his employer has sent him to fetch; he carries a parcel from home. Bring is an action performed at the option of the agent; fetch and carry are mostly done at the command of another.

Do not say, "When you come home, fetch some berries," but "bring some berries." Say "Fetch me my hat from the hall," and "Carry your umbrella with you."

The distinction between bring and fetch is sharply drawn in this passage from the Bible: "And as she was going to fetch it, he called to her and said, Bring me, I pray thee, a morsel of bread."

broke. This word has acquired a certain respectable colloquial use in the sense, "without funds." It is of course a corruption of broken, but the original word does not fit the case and "broke" has come to stay.

bulk. "The bulk of the crop is uncut." This use of the word, in the sense of greater part, mass, or majority, "the bulk of the people," is opposed by many careful writers.

bully. Widely accepted as vigorous slang for splendid, fine, first-rate. The word is "good old English," and there is a flavor of its present slang use about Shakespeare's "Bless you, bully doctor." Sponsors of vigorous English, like the late Theodore Roosevelt used the word freely, but its use nevertheless is regarded as coarse.

burlesque. Accented on the last syllable, bur-lesk′.

bursted. Should never be used. The past tense and past participle of the verb "to burst" is "burst." Say, "The gun burst," not "bursted," and of course avoid the vulgarism "busted." "He burst in upon them," "The balloon has burst at last," are correct. There is no such form as "bursted," save in the mouths of ignorant speakers.

bum. This is a slang word which is too coarse for refined usage, and yet it has become so generally employed—"He's a bum," "A bum job," "I feel bum," that it will be difficult to correct it.

but. Misused in many ways. For instance: "I do not doubt but, or but that" should be "I do not doubt that," "I should not wonder but," should be "wonder if."

"Doubt but that" is a common error. The "but" should be omitted.

"But" is incorrect after "no sooner," which should be followed by "than." A similar rule should be observed with regard to "no other." Say "no other than she," not "no other but she."

After the verb fear, "but that" is frequently permissible, as in "I have no fear but that he will speak," signifying certainty that he will speak, which can be equally well expressed by "I have no fear that he will not speak."

but what. Correctly used in "I read nothing but what I enjoy," but often misused for "but that," in sentences like "She would not believe but what I did it." "I have no doubt but what" is always wrong, and should be "I have no doubt that."

but yet. Improperly used when either "but" or "yet" would convey the meaning intended.

by. Frequently misused for with, from, and for. It is properly used before an agent or doer; "with" should precede the instrument or means; thus, "He was struck by his assailant with a knife."

"Her hat was adorned by feathers," should be "with feathers."

When the New York Times spoke of "a gentleman by the name of Hinkley," a New York Sun purist remarked: "Oh, no! You mean, 'a gentleman of the name of Hinkley.' This is English, you know." But we easily may know a man of the name of Hinkley "by" the name of Smith. He may rejoice in an alias, or we may have been mistaken in his name. "A gentleman named Hinkley" would have rendered criticism unnecessary.

by, bye. The preposition and the adverb are invariably "by," but the noun may be spelled "bye." We may use either form in "by the by (e)," where the last word is the noun, but in the adverbial phrase "by and by," only the shorter "by" is permissible.

cab. This has become a perfectly good word, although, when first taken from the word cabriolet, it was considered slang of the most common variety.

cabaret. Pronounced ka-ba-ray—first two a's as in fast, last a long; be sure to make three syllables of this word, with a very slight accent on the second one.

cada′ver. Pronounced ka-da′ver (long a), not ka-dav′er.

cafe. Pronounced ka-fay—first a as in fast, last a long.

Cairo. The name of the Egyptian capital is pronounced ki′ro (long i); the Cairo in Illinois is called ka′ro (long a).

calamity. Should not be misused for "loss". A calamity is a great disaster or misfortune.

calculate. Often misused for think, suppose, believe, expect, or intend. "I calculate to go home," should be, "I intend, or expect, to go home." By "I calculate you are right," the uneducated speaker means "I suppose, or believe, you are right."

A very common misuse of "calculated" prevails among people who pride themselves on their correct English but say: "His nomination is calculated to lose votes for the ticket." The meaning to be conveyed is that of likely or apt, and these words should be used instead of "calculated," the sense of which is "adjusting means to an end, computing, reckoning, projecting."

When used in the sense of devised or adapted, "calculated" is permissible, as in "His speech was calculated to avoid trouble." Eminent writers like Goldsmith and Cobbett have at times used "calculated" for "likely" or "suited," though such use is generally deprecated.

caliber. Should not be used with the adjectives high, low, etc. Caliber being the inside measure of a cavity, as a gun-barrel, it can be modified only by adjectives expressing expansion. "An essay or poem of higher caliber" is ridiculous. The writer of such a sentence might as well speak of a broader altitude, a thinner circumference, or a bulkier range. "Larger, or greater, caliber" is correct.

can. Often misused for may. When a boy says, "Can I eat an apple?" the question is unnecessary. Of course he "can." He means to ask "May I eat an apple?" "Can" denotes possibility; "may" liberty and probability. He who has sound limbs can walk, but he may not walk on the grass when signs forbid.

canine. This word means like a dog, or pertaining to a dog, but is commonly misused for the word dog. It is preferably accented on the last syllable, kanine', long i.

carbine. Pronounced kar'bine with long i; not kar'been or kar'bin.

card. Mispronounced kyard; should be kard. "We have heard," says William Henry P. Phyfe, "that this affectation thrives especially in young ladies' schools, and in the circles of the would-be elegant."

carry. See bring.

carry on. A colloquialism for "to frolic." Popularized during the World War with a somewhat different meaning—to advance, to go through.

cartridge. Often mispronounced kat'rij. Should be always kart'rij.

case. Some of the commonest errors in English speech arise from the misuse of the cases. Even authors of repute are not free from errors of this kind, of which the following are examples:

"Let you and I go"—should be "you and me."

"I am as good as her"—should be "as she."

"You are younger than me"—should be "than I."

"Come to dinner with John and I"—should be "John and me." This error occurs with regrettable frequency.

"Between you and I"—should be "you and me." "And I" should never be added to another pronoun in the objective case.

"Where are you going? Who? Me?"—should be "Who? I?"

"Who do you see?"—should be "whom."

"If I was her"—should be "If I were she."

"Was it him?"—should be "Was it he?"

"Who is it by?"—should be "whom."

"It was me," "it was him," "it was her," are faulty expressions frequently heard in all classes of society. "It is not me you are in love with," wrote Addison, and very many good English writers and speakers follow his example and use "not me."

casualty. Often mispelled casuality. Not always synonymous with accident. Accidents are often caused by carelessness, while casualties are altogether independent of ourselves.

catalogue. Many business institutions that issue catalogs omit the final ue—which form should be adopted generally.

cemetery. Not sem'e-tri, but seme'-ter-i, with four distinct syllables.

chamois. Pronounced sham'i (the skin) and sha-moi' (the animal).

character, reputation. Not interchangeable, though frequently used as such. Character lies in the man; it is the mark of what he is, and shows itself on all occasions. Reputation depends upon others; it is what they think of him. One's character is not affected by what others say, though one's reputation may be. A man of good reputation may not have a good character, and vice versa.

charivari. Colloquially pronounced and sometimes spelled shiv'a-ree.

chastisement. Not chas-tize'ment, but chas'tiz-ment.

childish. Often misused for childlike. Childish manners are offensive in those that have ceased to be children, but a childlike person may be inoffensive.

chimney. Pronounced chim'ni. The pronunciation chim'bli, common in England, is a gross error.

chocolate. Three syllables, chok'o-late, not chok'lut.

chose. Often misused for chosen. "Which have you chose?" should be "chosen."

citizen. Sometimes used with a certain affectation of the sense of "citoyen" in the first French republic; thus, "Several citizens carried the wounded man to a drug store." The substitution of "persons" or "bystanders" would improve the sentence, and such use of the word "citizen" is careless. The good Samaritans who carried the sufferer to the drug store may not have been "citizens" at all. but large hearted aliens fresh from foreign shores. A citizen is a person who has certain political rights, and the word is properly used only to imply or suggest the possession of these rights.

civil. Pronounced siv'il, not siv'ul.

claim. Should not be used in the simple sense of assert or maintain, but is correctly employed to avow a right belonging to any one, especially when attempts are made to prove its justice or regain its possession. Thus, "I claim you are wrong" should be "I say, or I maintain, you are wrong."

clergy. A collective noun, not to be used for a stated number of individuals. Say, "A dozen clergymen," not "a dozen clergy."

clever. An over-worked word often used with the meaning good-natured, well-disposed, but properly applied to persons possessing ability of any kind, and to things that exhibit or indicate cleverness; thus, a clever workman or speaker; a clever animal or trick. Cleverness is properly mental power employed in the ordinary concerns of life. Clever signifies the same as quick of understanding.

climax. Often misused as a synonym for acme, which has an entirely different meaning.

clothes. Properly pronounced klothz, though the colloquial pronunciation kloze is almost universal.

cockswain. No kok'sn calls himself a kok'swain.

cognomen. Often wrongly accented on the first syllable. Should be pronounced kog-no'men.

collect. It was formerly regarded as incorrect to speak of "collecting" a bill, the sense of collect being to gather items together, but usage has legitimized the expression, and has also given us "collectable" in the sense of "good" as applied to commercial paper.

colloquialism. Applied to any expression peculiar to the language of common conversation. Many colloquialisms are permissible to good speakers; others are tainted with vulgarity.

column. Pronounced kol'um, not kolume.

commence. See begin.

comparison. The superlative degree is not to be used when only two objects are compared. Say, "Alice is the prettier of the two," not "the prettiest of the two."

compare with. We compare things that are nearly alike "with" one another and "to" something else that they are thought to resemble in some particular. Thus, we compare the members of a legislature "with" one another and "to" Daniel Webster.

compliment. Compare this word with complement in the main vocabulary.

complexion. Do not corrupt the good word complexioned into complected, there being no authority for the latter.

completion. To speak of "final completion" is redundancy. Completion involves finality.

The word "completed" is often wrongly used for "finished." A thing that is finished is often far from being completed.

compromise. Always pronounced kom'-pro-mize, never kom-prom'is.

comptroller. Unfortunately we have this word and should make the best of it by pronouncing it the same as its synonym, controller.

condign. The meaning of this word is often confused with that of severe. Condign means deserved or merited. Do not say anything "deserves condign punishment." "It will meet with condign punishment" is correct.

condolence. Should always be accented on the second syllable, kon-do'lens.

conjure. The diverse meanings and pronunciations of this word should be mastered by all careful speakers. When the sense is to practice magic, the pronunciation is kun'jer; when we mean "to appeal to" we pronounce the word kun-joor'.

construction. Many of the errors into which speakers and writers frequently fall are faults of construction. Following are a few general suggestions for the avoidance of common errors:

In the construction of sentences care should be taken to choose the simplest words, and those which most directly convey the meaning one wishes to express. Three things are necessary in a correct sentence—purity, propriety, and precision.

Purity consists in using such words and expressions as belong to the English language, rather than words or phrases drawn from foreign or dead languages, or that are ungrammatical, obsolete, newly-coined or not sanctioned by usage. The use of words that are not English is a violation of this rule, and is termed a barbarism.

Propriety in speaking and writing consists in the use of words sanctioned by the usage of the best speakers and writers to convey one's meaning, and in the avoidance of low, vulgar, or less elegant and less significant words. In order to remain faithful to this principle the following points should be borne in mind:

1. Avoid low or slang expressions.
2. Supply words that are wanting.
3. Do not use the same word in different senses. Wherever it is possible, avoid the use of technical terms; by which is meant unfamiliar expressions peculiar to some art, occupation or profession.

4. Do not use ambiguous or equivocal words.

5. Avoid unintelligible and inconsistent words or phrases.

6. When words or phrases are not adapted to the ideas you intend to communicate, avoid the use of them.

Precision suggests making speech or writing a concise statement of thoughts, so clear that no one can fail to comprehend the exact meaning. One may use words that convey a meaning different from that which one intends; or they may not entirely convey one's meaning; or they may convey more than one intends. Precision is designed to express neither more nor less than the exact thought. Sentences of moderate length, clearly and strikingly expressed, are the best.

consul. Often mispronounced kown'sel; should be kon'sul.

consummate. "Of all the queer uses of big words which are creeping into vogue, the use of this word, both in speech and in the newspapers, to express the performance of the marriage ceremony, is the queerest," says Richard Grant White in Words and Their Uses. "For instance, I heard a gentleman gravely say to two ladies, 'The marriage was consummated at Paris last April.' Now, consummation is necessary to a complete marriage, but it is not usually talked about openly in general society. The gentleman meant that the ceremony took place at Paris."

contemptible. Sometimes misused for contemptuous, as contemptibly is for contemptuously. We do not "speak contemptibly" of another, but contemptuously. A contemptible act may occasion a contemptuous remark, but not a contemptible remark. "Sir," remarked a man to Dr. Parr, "I have a contemptible opinion of you." "All your opinions are contemptible," replied the doctor.

Contemptible is applied to the thing deserving contempt; contemptuous to that which is expressive of contempt. Persons, or what is done by persons, may be either contemptible or contemptuous, but a thing is only contemptible. A production is contemptible; a remark or look is contemptuous.

continuous. Often confounded with continual. A continuous action, according to Whately, is one that is uninterrupted, and goes on unceasingly as long as it lasts. Continual is that which is constantly renewed and recurring; it admits of intervals; as, continual showers in the spring. "Continual" interruptions prevent a "continuous" train of thought. We speak of a "continuous brake" and say with Martyn "Our life is one continued (or continual) toil for fame."

contour. Look up in this dictionary the meaning and pronunciation of this word and such words as coterie, coupe, courier, courtier, cuisine, cynosure, and similar words that are generally used, but rarely understood.

contradiction. Contradictory terms should be avoided, yet frequently are found in juxtaposition in English speech. "Stern amenities" is an example—as if the pleasant features of anything could be stern!

contumacy. The stress must always be placed on the first syllable, con'tu-ma-cy, not on the second.

convene, convoke. Properly speaking, the President convokes (calls together) Congress in special session, and then Congress convenes (comes together). To say, "The President has convened Congress" is therefore incorrect. Convene is misused, says Richard Grant White, in the Constitution of the United States itself, which is singularly free from errors in the use of language.

converse. As an adjective this word is not to be used when the meaning to be conveyed is simply that of the opposite, the contrary, or the reverse. The converse is that which exists in a reciprocal relation to something else.

coöperate together. In this locution the word together is superfluous, its sense being included in the word coöperate.

cornet. Not to be pronounced kor-net'; the stress is on the first syllable, kor'net.

corporal, corporeal. These adjectives are synonyms for "bodily," but are not to be used indiscriminately. We say corporal punishment, but corporeal substances. Corporal is only employed for the animal frame in its proper sense; corporeal is used for animal substance in its extended sense; corporeal is distinguished from spiritual, and corporal from mental. We speak of "a violent and corporal revenge," but say "When the soul is freed from all corporeal alliances, then it truly exists.

cosmetic. The first syllable is pronounced koz', not kos'.

cotemporary. The form contemporary is always preferable.

couple. Misused when the meaning is simply two. "Two ladies" is a better phrase than "a couple of ladies." A couple is not merely a pair of similar individuals, but a pair bound together by some close tie or intimate relationship; who, in brief, are coupled. "It is as incorrect and as absurd," says White, "to speak of a couple of ladies, or a couple of prizes, as of a couple of earthquakes, or a couple of comets."

cranberry. Pronounced as spelled, not cramberry, which is so common.

creditable. Many speakers misuse this word, which means worthy of approbation, for credible, worthy of belief. We are not "creditably informed," but "credibly informed."

creek. Usually mispronounced krik; should be kreek.

crushed. In "the rebellion was crushed out," the word "out" is superfluous, as crush means to press out of shape.

culinary. Pronounced kiu'lin-a-ri, not kul'.

cupola. Commonly mispronounced kiu'-pa-lo; it should be as written, kiu'po-la.

curious. Used in the sense of rare, singular, exciting curiosity, as in "a curious circumstance," this word has been the subject of much criticism. Regardless of the critics, it is now well established in such use.

custom, habit. Must be distinguished in use. Custom is a frequent repetition of the same act; habit is the effect of such repetition. The custom of early rising is conducive to health, and may become a habit. A custom is followed; a habit acquired. Custom is applicable to bodies of men, habit is confined to the individual.

The words customary and habitual admit of a similar distinction.

cute. A better word will always be found for use in place of this word, which is an abbreviation of the word acute.

dahlia. Sometimes mispronounced in three syllables instead of two—dal-ya, both a's soft.

dainty, delicacy. The former is properly used of delicacies that are rare and costly, while there are many delicacies that, in their season, are both plentiful and cheap and not necessarily dainty.

dais. Sometimes mispronounced dy'as; should be da'is.

damage. When used for "cost," as in the question "What's the damage?" this word becomes a gross colloquialism.

dandelion. Four full syllables, dan-de-li'on; not dan'de-line.

dangerous. Often misused in speaking of the sick. "He is quite ill, but not dangerous," is a reflection on the patient's mental condition. "Not dangerously" or "not in danger" would properly express the meaning intended.

dashes. According to William Cobbett dashes should be dealt out with a sparing hand. In his "English Grammar," he said: "The dash is a cover for ignorance as to the use of points, and it can answer no other purpose."

In Cobbett's time that may have held true—dashes then were used as a substitute for proper punctuation. Now they have grown into a place of their own—indicating a slightly longer pause than the comma—less stressed than parenthesis. Some years ago an editorial writer in the state of North Dakota became locally famous because of his disregard of punctuation and his liberal use of dashes. He was wont to say, "Anybody can punctuate. A high school boy could put in commas and colons. I put in thoughts." Whether he used periods, as quoted, or dashes to separate his sentences, is not known now; but does that matter?

data. As a Latin word it should be pronounced day'ta—first a long. Many do not seem to know that this word is the plural of datum—a word seldom seen or heard.

day before yesterday. This mode of speech requires the definite article, "the day before yesterday."

deaf. Pronounced def. The pronunciation deef is rarely heard in recent years.

decade. Now used absolutely for the period of ten years, though originally meaning only the sum or number of ten.

deceased. In many editorial rooms the use of "the deceased" for "the dead person" is prohibited. "Deceased was a good citizen." The absence of "the" before "deceased" is an error. If deceased is used at all, it should be with the definite article.

decimate. Strictly speaking, this word can be properly used only in its original sense, to take the tenth part of. Some modern writers have used it as in the following instance: "The troops, although fighting bravely, were terribly decimated and gave way." They might as well have written, says a purist, that the troops were terribly halved, or frightfully quartered.

When a Roman cohort revolted, and the revolt was crushed, a common punishment was to decimate the cohort—that is, select every tenth man (decimus) by lot, and put him to death. If a cohort suffered in battle so that about one man in ten was killed, it was consequently said to be decimated. But to use decimation as a general phrase for great slaughter is unwise.

decollete. There is only one correct pronunciation, day-kol-tay', and it should be used only by those who know how to use it.

decorous. Commonly pronounced dek'o-rus, but de-ko'rus is insisted on by authorities on pronunciation.

defalcate. Not to be pronounced de-fawl'kate, but de-fal'kate with first a short.

deficit. Accent on the first syllable, def'-is-it, not on the second syllable.

deliverance, delivery. Sometimes confounded in use. "Deliverance," says Crabb, "denotes the taking something from oneself; delivery implies giving something to another. We wish for deliverance from that which is hurtful or painful; we effect delivery when we place property in the hands of its owner. We should say, deliverance from evil, delivery of goods."

demean. Should not be used in the sense of debase, degrade, lower. To demean is simply to conduct, to carry oneself, and one can demean oneself well or ill.

democracy. Objected to by some writers when applied to a political party. The whole body of voters, under a government by the people, properly constitutes the democracy.

depositary, depository. The former is used for a person who is a trustee, and the latter for a place of keeping valuables.

depot. Say dee'po, not day'po as long use has made of it a word of our own language.

depths. Often carelessly mispronounced deps, an error to be avoided.

designate. Des'-, not dez' nor dis.

desist. There is authority for the pronunciation de-zist', and it is common, but by some de-sist' is preferred.

devouring element. Often used, especially by young writers, where the simple word fire would be better.

diction. A general term applicable to the mode of expressing ourselves. Good diction is that which is pure and clear. Errors in grammar, false construction, a confused disposition of words, or an improper application of them, constitutes incorrect diction. We speak properly of the diction of a beginner in composition, and of the style of an author of matured mind. Diction is used mostly of what is written; phrase and phraseology are terms applied to spoken and to written language.

dictionary, lexicon, etc. In discriminating between these words, often interchanged, it may be noted that a lexicon is a species of dictionary appropriately applied to the dead languages. A Greek or a Hebrew lexicon is distinguished from a French or an English dictionary. A vocabulary is a partial kind of dictionary, which may be only a simple list of words arranged in order, or otherwise, and with or without explanation. A glossary is an explanatory vocabulary, one that serves to explain the terms employed by an author.

different from. "Different to" is heard sometimes instead of "different from," but is without the support of authority.

differ from. We should invariably "differ from" our opponents and not "differ with" them. Some writers use the preposition "with" with differ, but the weight of authority must be given to "from."

directly. Used in the sense of "as soon as," but with little reason or authority. "Directly he entered" should be "as soon as he entered."

dirt. Popularly misused for "earth"—so generally that the word has partly lost its signification of "filth," and people speak of "a dirt road" and even of the anomaly "clean dirt." "Matter in the wrong place" was Lord Palmerston's definition of dirt, and according to an English writer "it is casting an imputation on the wisdom of the Creator to say that he has made our beautiful earth entirely out of dirt." There is no excuse for the misuse of this word when earth or loam, sand or gravel, is intended, and "a dirt road" for an unpaved road will continue to be an abomination to careful speakers, in spite of its popularity. Dirt means filth and a thing that is dirty is foul. The words have properly no other meaning.

discommode. This word has been replaced somewhat by "incommode," which is regarded as the better form.

dispense with. The preposition "with" is used with dispense when the sense is to do without; as, to dispense with the reading of a bill, to dispense with the services of a salesman. When the sense is to give, or give out, we use "to"; as, to dispense medicines to the poor; to dispense news of a shipwreck to the anxious.

disremember. Originally in good literary use, now replaced by "forget," which is much better.

district. Pronounced dis'trikt, not dis'-trick, nor dees'trict.

divers, diverse. Should be carefully distinguished in use. "Divers" means sundry, several; "diverse" signifies different, distinct. Men hold diverse opinions; they may meet in divers places every day. But divers is little used.

do. In a certain sense the most comprehensive verb in the English language. It is used to express almost any kind of action, and is involved in innumerable idiomatic constructions. Thus, we may do one's hair, do a problem, and do meat thoroughly—or at least say that it is well done.

As a substitute, "do" is used for a verb to prevent repetition of it; thus, "I shall probably come, but if I do not, you need not wait"; that is, "if I do not come, if I come not."

For the various correct uses of "do" as an auxiliary, etc., see the treatment of the word in its alphabetic place in the regular vocabulary of this dictionary.

dock, wharf. "Dock" is often misused for wharf or pier; as, "We walked along the docks; he fell off the dock, and was drowned." A dock is properly an open place without a roof, into which anything is received and where it is inclosed for safety. A prisoner stands, or formerly stood, in the dock at his trial. A vessel is taken into a dock for repairs. Shipping lies at the wharves or piers of a city, but goes into docks.

does n't. A proper contraction of does not, and should never be used as a contraction of do not—as it so often is by those that should know better.

donate. Should be used only of important or official gifts, not as a mere synonym of "give." We properly "donate" a million dollars to an endowment fund, but "give" a cake to a church fair.

done. This "done" is frequently a very great offender against grammar, says William Cobbett. As the passive participle of to do, it is very often misused. To do is the act of doing. We often see people write, "I did not speak yesterday so well as I wished to have done." Now, what is meant by the writer? He means to say that he did not speak so well as he then wished, or was wishing, to speak. Therefore, the sentence should be, "I did not speak yesterday so well as I wished to do." That is to say so well as I wished to do it.

Care should be taken not to be too free in the use of the handy verb to do in any of its modes or tenses. Its employment is usually the result of a limited vocabulary.

don't. Permissible as a colloquial contraction of "do not." We should never say "Why don't he go?" "Doesn't" is the proper contraction in this case—"Why doesn't he go?" The misuse of "don't" in such cases is very common, even by good, but thoughtless, speakers.

dozen. See score.

dramatist. Pronounced dram'a-tist, not dra'ma-tist.

drank. Used in error as the past participle of "drink." "I drank" is the correct past, but say "I have drunk," not "I have drank." The error is common and many people are led into the error of saying "I have drank" by the fear of having the perfectly proper participle "drunk" confounded with the participial adjective which means intoxicated.

dress. The modern misuse of the word for gown, frock, or suit, is to be deprecated. Compare these words in the main vocabulary.

drive, ride. A distinction is made, or sought to be made between these words by people of fashion. We are supposed to "drive" when we go out in a private carriage or automobile, especially one that might be driven by the owner, and to "ride" in public conveyances.

Those who do not make these distinctions "drive" when they handle the reins or are at the wheel, and "ride" with the driver.

drowned. Avoid the very ignorant pronunciation of this word as dround'ed. It has only one syllable, dround.

Dutch. Does not mean Germans, but Hollanders.

dynasty. Some authorities say din'as-te, but the pronunciation generally preferred is dy'nas-te.

each. Must be used in construction with the singular verb. The same applies to every. Do not say, "Each of us have" but "Each of us has." "Every one of them dance" should be "Every one of them dances."

eat. The correct forms for the past tense and past participle of the verb to eat are "ate" and "eaten." "I ate an apple" is preferable to "I eat an apple," although the latter is supported by some authorities and is frequently used colloquially.

editorial. Objected to as a noun by some who prefer the English "leader" or "leading article," but the word is well established as applied to articles on the "editorial page," expressing the policy of a newspaper, or the opinions of its responsible editors.

effect, affect. Must be carefully distinguished. "Effect" means to bring about. We effect a purpose, a reconciliation, or a change. "Affect" means to influence. We affect the feelings of our friends by our behavior. Rain affects the crops. To effect is to produce, to affect is to concern.

effluvia. It is incorrect to speak of "a disagreeable effluvia." "Effluvium" is the singular form for a foul odor, and as it includes the idea of foul, it is pleonastic to call an effluvium "disagreeable." We may correctly say "Effluvia (that is, foul odors) abound in the alleys."

egg. Even this simple little word is generally mispronounced aig.

either, neither. The word either, which means one of two, is often improperly employed, as when it is used to denote one of three or more. We may say, "Either the dog or the cat," but not "Either the dog, the cat, or the pig."

In popular usage, however, and by some good writers, either and neither, while properly applicable to two only, have long been used in relation to more than two. Notwithstanding this, "any" and "none" should be used, rather than "either" and "neither," when more than two things are referred to.

"Will you have tea, coffee, or milk?" "I do not care for either of them." Should be "any of them."

eke out. We "eke out" a thing when we add to it so that it will go further, or make it just barely suffice for the requirements of an occasion; as, to eke out a dinner prepared for four on the arrival of a fifth guest. "Eke out" does not mean to "use sparingly," but it is improperly used in that sense.

elder, older. Correctly used with the following distinction: We speak of a man as older than his neighbor, the elder of two brothers, and the eldest of his family. Elder and eldest are applied to persons only, while older and oldest are used of persons and things.

electric. Pronounced as it is spelled, not lek-trik.

elegant. A good word often abused. The correct meanings are refined, polished, rich, and nicely discriminating. Used in less dignified senses, it becomes offensive to the ear. Only a careless speaker has "an elegant time" or "an elegant supper," and "elegant weather" is enjoyed only by the uneducated.

eleven. It is not affectation but simple justice to its syllables to pronounce this word correctly, e-lev'n, not lev'n as it is so often mispronounced, nor e-lev'en.

elm. Avoid el'um and pronounce it as spelled.

else. Should be followed by "than," not by "but." "Nothing else than pride" should be "nothing else but pride." Else is redundant in "No one else but me," and should be omitted.

Opinions differ as to the best use of "else" in conjunction with anybody, nobody, and somebody, when the possessive is to be indicated. Shall we say "anybody else's umbrella" or "the umbrella is anybody's else"? Says the New York Times: "Public-school teachers are informed that 'anybody else's' is correct." On the other hand, Alfred Ayres says: "It is better grammar and more euphonious to consider else as being an adjective and to form the possessive by adding the apostrophe and s to the word that else qualifies."

emigrant, immigrant. Only careless speakers confound these words. They are quite distinct in meaning; one departs from, the other arrives in, a country. The emigrant leaving Liverpool becomes an immigrant on his arrival in New York.

employe. There are good reasons for preferring this Anglicized form of the word, with only one e at the end, applied to the male and female worker indiscriminately.

endorse. See indorse.

endways. An undesirable variant of endwise.

enervate. The orthoepists call this word e-ner'vate; the people defy the authorities and insist on pronouncing it en'ervate.

engine. Avoid the vulgar pronunciation en'jine. En'jin is correct.

euthuse. A modern colloquialism which seems to have literary recognition. There was at one time little or no excuse for it, and at first good speakers carefully refrained from bidding it welcome to the language.

epithet. A word commonly misunderstood. "To apply an epithet" to a person is not necessarily to villify him, since epithets may be complimentary as well as insulting. An epithet is the technical term of the rhetorician for an adjective or adjectival phrase. An epithet may be either gentle or harsh, and all adjectives are epithets. We "apply an epithet" to Alexander when we call him "the Great."

epoch. Pronounced ep'ok or e'pok.

equally as. Such expressions are redundant. "Equally well" is the correct form, not "equally as well," or the "equally" may be omitted. We may like John, and James as well, or equally well.

equanimity. Avoid the phrase "equanimity of mind." "Equanimity" means equal-mindedness and the "of mind" is superfluous. "Anxiety of mind" is a similar pleonasm.

equipage. Pronounced ek'wi-paje, not e-kwip'aje.

erysipelas. The first syllable is frequently mispronounced. The word is er-i-sip'e-las, not ir-i-sip'las.

esquire. This word and its abbreviation, Esq., is now seldom used.

"I have yet to discover what a man means when he addresses a letter to John Dash, Esq. (who is in no manner distinguished or distinguishable from other Dashes), except that Mr. Dash shall think he means to be polite," says Richard Grant White.

If the addition of "Esq." to a man's name on an envelope or letterhead is required to convince him that his correspondent means to be polite, he is behind the times.

European. Pronounced yu-ro-pe'an, not yu-ro'pe-an. Accent on the third syllable, not the second.

evening. Correctly pronounced in three syllables, e'vn-ing.

eventuate. Long regarded by some writers as a barbarism like "donate." But the word has found its way into the dictionaries, with the meaning "to occur as a result, to happen; also, to come to an end, to terminate," and the inexorable logic of facts points to its final inclusion in the language.

even up. Used as a colloquialism for "to balance, to balance accounts with." The phrase has no literary recognition.

ever. "Seldom or ever" is the wrong way of saying "Seldom or never," while "seldom if ever" is preferable to both.

ever so. This phrase meaning "to whatever extent" must be distinguished from "never so," which means "especially," in expressions like "ever so great" and "never so great." Grammarians differ as to the propriety of using "never" in such sentences as "charm he never so wisely," and the majority of writers employ "ever so" in a like sense.

every. Such expressions as "every confidence in a person, every care, every charity," etc., are becoming common in English speech and literature, though they are of recent growth. The meaning being that of "all" or "entire," it is better to use those words instead of the doubtful "every" in such cases.

evidence. See proof.

evil. Often mispronounced ee'vil in the pulpit; should be ee'vl.

exaggeration. Always should be avoided in speech and writing. "Weak minds and feeble writers and speakers delight in superlatives."

exit. Mispronounced egz'it; should be eks'it.

exodus. Properly used only of the departure or withdrawal of a large number of people. The withdrawal of an individual is not an exodus, but properly may be an exit.

expect. Often misused with reference to the past; also for "think, suppose, believe," and sometimes for "suspect." We cannot "expect" what happened yesterday, as in "I expect you thought I was remiss," where the meaning is "I suppose." Say, "I think, or believe, it is," not "I expect it is."

expect likely. An example of careless speech. "I expect likely," should always be "I think it is likely," or "I think it probable," etc.

experience. Often used where a simple "have" would be equally effective and in better taste. Let us "have" trouble with a person, and not "experience" it. The substitute "suffer" should also be borne in mind.

experiment. We "make" experiments, not try them. To say "try the experiment" is similar to saying "try the attempt" or "try the trial."

explicable. Properly accented on the first syllable not the second.

exploit, v. Now used by good writers with the meaning "to speculate upon, to use for one's own benefit," as, to exploit one's friends and acquaintances.

exquisite. Pronounced eks'kwiz-it, not eks-kwiz'it.

extempore. Often mispronounced extem'pore; should be extem'po-re.

face. "How could you have the face to do it?" is an expression gone out of style.

facet. Mispronounced fai'set; should be fas'et.

factory. Three syllables, fak'to-ri, not fak'tri.

fan. Another over-worked slang term—baseball fan, football fan, racing fan—and now radio fan. As slang, the word is all right, but should not be used otherwise.

farther, further. Farther is preferred in speaking of distance, further in the sense of additional, as of time, mention, or treatment. "I can see farther than you"; "further remarks are unnecessary."

faucet Mispronounced fas'et; should be faw'cet.

favorite. Often mispronounced with the long sound of i, fa'vor-ite; should be fa'vor-it.

February. Careless speakers often omit the first r sound, saying feb'u-a-ri instead of feb'roo-a-ri.

female, n. To be distinguished in use from woman. "Female" is often wrongly used when "woman" is required by good taste and correctness. Female properly denotes the sex, woman the individual as the correlative of man. Man is never confounded with the lower animals and "woman" should not be. "The repugnance not unnatural to a female" should read "not unnatural to a woman," but "female" is correctly used in the following sentence: "The proportion of females to the population is greater in the east." A woman may be called a female in contempt, and the overnice editor who once changed the definition of sea-nymph from "a female deity of the sea" to "a woman deity" would not have had the sanction of the women's clubs.

feminine. Often mispronounced fem'inine; should be fem'i-nin. Sometimes confounded in use with females. The adjective female is applicable to the sex and to the essential physiological distinctions from the male; feminine to the mental qualities and finer characteristics of women and to the things appropriate to them. Female is opposed to male, feminine to masculine.

fetch. See bring.

finale. Mispronounced fi-nale'; should be fi-nah'le.

finance. Usually mispronounced fy'nans, with the stress on the first syllable; should be fi-nans'. Also "financial" is often mispronounced fy'nan-shal; should be fi-nan'shal.

"Financier" is seldom correctly pronounced; it is not fy'nan-seer, but fin-an-seer'.

fire fiend. The "fiend" is usually conjured up by the imagination of inexperienced writers and may be omitted with advantage.

first. "The two first" and "the two last" are forms of speech sanctioned by good authority, but "the first two" and "the last two" are preferred, especially when the two things referred to are in the same series. "The two first" is correct when each of the objects heads a series.

"First" is superfluous in "You must first join the society before you can attend its meetings."

firstly. Improperly used in place of the word first, even when followed by "secondly, thirdly," etc.

fix, v. In colloquial usage "fix" is a verbal general worker. In the sense of putting in order, preparing, adjusting, or repairing it is somewhat general in application and loose in meaning and is applied colloquially to a wide range of subjects. Its development "fix up" has also attained a certain kind of recognition in the sense of to settle, to arrange; as, to fix up a quarrel or a matter of business. "Fix" is sometimes vulgarly misused in the sense of to injure, disable or kill.

fix, n. "A bad fix" is a weak colloquialism for "a difficult position" or "a bad condition" and should be avoided.

flee, fly. We flee from an enemy, and fly to the sickbed of a friend. The preterit and also the past participle of the former is fled, not flew, which is the preterit of fly. Say, "He fled the city," not he flew, but "the bird flew over the city."

florid. Mispronounced flo'rid: should be flor'id.

folk. Distinguished from "folks." Used collectively for people in general or any number of them. We say correctly "They are a fishing folk," referring to the whole community, but "The old folks at home," referring to certain individuals of a family, or to one's relatives.

foot. We say properly a two-foot rule, a six-foot man, not a two-feet rule, etc.

for, to, etc. Often used redundantly, as in "Where are you bound for? Where are you going to?"

forbear from. We should "forbear to" do things, not "forbear from" doing them.

forbid. We do not properly forbid a person "from" doing something, but forbid him to do it or forbid his doing it.

forget. Not forgit', but for-get'.

formidable. Mispronounced for-mid'a-bl. The accent is on the first syllable, for'mid-a-bl.

forward, forwards. The first form may be used as either an adjective or an adverb, the latter is an adverb only. As with upward, downward, onward, and other adverbial compounds of "ward" that may be written with a final s, the s is generally considered superfluous.

friends. Often mispronounced frenz. The d is not silent; should be frendz.

from. Not to be used with the verb "to die" in cases like "He died from the plague," which should be "died of." But "died from the effects of" is correct.

froze. Often misused for frozen. A billiard-player says "The balls are froze"; it should be "frozen."

-ful. Adjectives ending in -ful should be compared by "more" and "most." Say, "The most careful man," not "the carefulest."

fulsome. Pronounced ful'sum, not fool' sum.

fungi. Pronounced fun'ji, not fung'gi. The latter is a common error.

future, a. Often misused for subsequent, after, thereafter, afterward, as in the following: "His future career is involved in mystery." Should be "his subsequent career." "Her future life was happy." Should be "her after life." "Many a time in the future he regretted the act." Should be "many a time afterward."

But when the statement is in the following form, "He said his future life would be unhappy," it is an indirect quotation, and the use of "future" is permissible.

G

g. Be sure to include this letter at the end of such words as going, singing, coming, doing, walking, etc., etc. Otherwise the sounds are like go-un, sing-un, com-un, etc., etc.

gala. Pronounced gai'la, not gal'a.

game. Too often this word is used by business men who are not so barren of words as to need it. "Business is a great game," they say, meaning that it is an interesting vocation. "I'm back in the game again," said an eminent surgeon returned from a vacation—doubtless shuffling his instruments for a new deal as he made the remark.

gape. Pronounced gahp, signifies to look with an open or wide mouth, and must be distinguished from stare, which is to look with a fixed eye.

gather. Often mispronounced geth'er.

genealogy. Often wrongly pronounced as if geneol'ogy.

generally. Misused when usually, frequently, or commonly would be the better word. Generally respects a whole body in distinction from an individual. Usually signifies according to use or custom. Frequently signifies properly a crowding, that is repetition many times by the same person or the action of many.

Commonly is opposed to rarely; generally to occasionally; usually to casually, and frequently to seldom.

gent. An abomination confined to the vulgar.

"Gent and pants. Let these words go together, like the things they signify. The one always wears the other."—R. G. White.

genuine. Mispronounced jen'u-ign, often by those who should know better. Should be jen'u-in.

geography. Not jog'ra-phi, but je-og'-ra-phi.

gerund. Not jee'rund, but jer'und. The gerundial form is seen in such sentences as "I have nothing to do," "She has no more to say," where the apparent infinitives are gerunds. "For to," as in "What went ye out for to see?" was once a sign of the gerund, but is now not used.

ghoul. Not gowl, but gool.

gondola. Not gon-do'la, but gon'do-la.

got. Misused, or at least superfluous, when the simple sense of possession can be expressed equally well by "have." "I have got a bank account" should be simply "I have a bank account." "Foxes have holes," not "have got holes."

In 1885 the New York Sun, which was accounted, under the editorship of Charles A. Dana, an authority on correct English, approved the use of "got" in the sentence, "Some men say nothing because they have got nothing to say."

"The use of the word 'got' in the above extract," said the Sun, "is entirely in accordance with the most venerable and picturesque idioms of the English language. This language . . . is not a machine, but a growth, and those who would reduce it to rigorous utilitarian forms would destroy its beauty. . . . The word objected to is neither inelegant nor superfluous."

But, asks a critic of the Sun's dictum, if not "inelegant and superfluous," what purpose does the word "got" serve? Does "have got" express more than "have"?

With his usual force, Richard Grant White attacked the misuse of "get" and "got" as follows:

"Get, one of the most willing and serviceable of our vocal servants, is one of the most ill-used and imposed upon—is indeed made a servant of all work, even by those who have the greatest retinue of words at their command. They use the word 'get'—the radical, essential, and inexpugnable meaning of which is the attainment of possession by voluntary exertion—to express the ideas of possessing, of receiving, of suffering, and even of doing. In all these cases the word is misused. A man gets riches gets a wife, gets children, gets well (after falling sick), and figuratively, gets him to bed, gets up, gets to his journey's end —in brief, gets anything that he wants and successfully strives for. But we constantly hear educated people speak of getting crazy, of getting a fever, and even of getting a flea on one. A man hastening to the train will say that he is afraid of getting left, and tell you afterward that he did or did not get left, meaning that he is afraid of being left, and that he was or was not left.

"The most common misuse of this word, however, is to express simple possession. It is said of a man that he has got this, that, or the other thing, or that he has not got it; what is meant being simply that he has it, or has it not—the use of the word 'got' being not only wrong, but if right, superfluous. Possession is completely expressed by 'have' 'get' expresses attainment by exertion.'

government. Often mispronounced guv'-er-ment. Should be guv'ern-ment, with due regard to the n of the second syllable This applies also to the word governor graduate. We now say "He graduated from Harvard" or "was graduated." Formerly the university "graduated" the student.

graft. This word is now popularly used to cover many forms of money-getting, usually of an illicit nature. Originally slang like boodle, etc., it seems to have established itself firmly in speech and literature.

Said Justice Brewer, "Every one charged with a trust should have an eye single to that trust. The moment private pecuniary gain is sought through the advantage of that trust, some one is guilty of grafting."

grammar. Those who wish to speak and write correctly should own a copy of Cobbett's Grammar and often refer to it. In the year 1817 William Cobbett wrote to his son: "The actions of men proceed from their thoughts. In order to obtain the coöperation, the concurrence, or the consent of others, we must communicate our thoughts to them The means of this communication are words; and grammar teaches us how to make use of words. Therefore, in all the ranks, degrees, and situations of life a knowledge of the principles and rules of grammar must be useful."

grammatical. Not to be used in the phrase, "grammatical error." "Error in grammar" is correct.

granary. Commonly mispronounced grain'a-ri; should be gran'a-ri. The word is not derived from "grain," but from the Latin "granarium."

gratuitous. The use of this word in the sense of unfounded, unwarranted, unreasonable, untrue, has been objected to by some writers on the score of impropriety. There is abundant authority, however, for such use of "gratuitous," and the usage is well established.

"True," says one critic, "dictionaries are found in which gratuitous is defined as meaning 'asserted without proof or reason.' But . . . dictionaries have come to be, in too many cases, the pernicious record of unreasonable, unwarranted, and fleeting usage."

This fling at the painstaking lexicographer, whose duty it is to record that which is sanctioned by usage, regardless of the individual preferences of the pundits, is decidedly "gratuitous," in all the various senses, unfounded, unwarranted, unreasonable, and untrue.

great. See big.

Greek. We say "a Greek temple" when we mean a temple in Greece, and "a Grecian temple" when we mean a temple built in imitation of the Greek style. Greek properly means belonging to Greece; Grecian, relating to Greece.

grievous. Mispronounced greev'i-ous. The word has only two syllables, greev'-ous.

gross. See score.

grow. Properly meaning to increase, and expressing enlargement, "grow" is now widely used in the sense of become, and even of diminish. It has normally come to be used to express a passage from one state to another; as, to grow mild, to grow faint, to grow dark—just as an acorn grows into an oak; and there is authority among good writers for even such apparent anomalies as grow small, grow less, and grow fewer.

grouch. A slang word originally, but it is so expressive that no other word quite takes its place.

guess. The common use of "I guess," with the meaning "I am inclined to think," needs no apology, especially when objected to by English critics who would substitute "I fancy." Even Shakespeare wrote:

"Not all together; better far, I guess.
That we do make our entrances several ways."

gums. Pronounced gumz. Those unfortunate enough to have acquired the pronunciation goomz should ask to be delivered from their affliction.

gunwale. Pronounced by sailors gun'el.

gyroscope. Pronounced ji'ro-skope, not gi'ro-.

gyvo. Pronounce with soft g and long i.

H

h. It must be remembered that this letter is simply an aspiration. It is silent in heir, heiress, honest, honor, hour, and their derivatives and compounds. In herb, hospital, humor, and humble, the h was formerly silent, but is now generally aspirated.

Difficulty in aspirating the h in the proper place is a strange characteristic of the poorly educated people of England, constituting a very large proportion of the population. It is not that the English masses cannot aspirate the h, for they do, but in the most inopportune places. The cockney, that curious product of London, is singularly unable to aspirate where there is an h, and particularly liberal with aspirations where there is none. When he is sick, he says, "Hi'm hill," and drives 'is 'orse 'ome as fast as 'e can 'ammer along the 'ard 'ighway. The strange feature of this form of speech is the cockney's blissful unconsciousness of error.

had better. The legitimacy of this locution and of the cognate "had rather" is denied by some grammarians, but both phrases are well established in the language, and there seems little to offend in the verse of the Psalmist: "I had rather be a doorkeeper in the house of my God than dwell in the tents of wickedness."

had . . . have. Incorrectly conjoined in such phrases as "Had I have known it, had we have been there," which should be, "Had I known it, had we been there." "Had" in such cases signifies "if I had," and the "have" is superfluous.

had ought. Always incorrect. "You had ought to go" is unpardonable error. The "had" is superfluous.

hain't. Always meaningless and objectionable as an abbreviation.

handwritten. The recent use of this past participle, to distinguish a letter written by hand from one that is typewritten, presupposed the existence of a verb, to handwrite, and this was found ready made in the pages of Sir Arthur Helps, the English essayist, who wrote, "Think what an accomplished man he would be, who could read well, handwrite well, talk well, speak well, and who should have good manners."

handy. Improperly used for near, nearby, as in "the grocer is handy." It is correctly used of anything close at hand, or suited to the use of the hand. Look it up in the general vocabulary of this dictionary.

hanged, hung. When a criminal is executed by hanging, he is "hanged," not "hung," but in all other senses of the verb to hang "hung" is the correct past tense and part participle. Thus, "They hanged the horse thief to the nearest tree, and the body hung till morning."

happened in. A colloquialism for "arrived in a casual manner, or by chance."

handful. Do not say "three handsful," but "three handfuls," meaning three measures of one handful each.

harass. Mispronounced ha-ras′; should be har′as. The accent is on the first syllable, in which the a-sound is the same as in pat.

hasn't, haven't. Permissible contractions of "has not, have not," especially when used at the beginning of an interrogative sentence, as "Haven't you heard the news?" but not used in the better forms of writing and speaking.

have. Often misused, especially in such sentences as "I wanted to have gone," where "I wanted to go" is the correct construction. "It had better been omitted," is improved by saying, "It would have been better to omit it." "I had as willingly be killed as captured," is sometimes regarded as a vulgarism, the better form being "I would as willingly."

"The most common error," wrote William Cobbett to his son, "is the using of the verb to have with the passive participle, when the past time simply or the infinitive of the verb ought to be used. 'Mr. Speaker, I expected . . . to have seen the bank paying in gold and silver.' This is House of Commons language. Avoid it as you would avoid all the rest of their doings. 'I expected 'to see' to be sure, and not 'have seen,' because the 'have seen' carries your act of seeing back beyond the period within which it is supposed to have been expected to take place. 'I called on him and wished to have submitted my manuscript to him.' Five hundred such errors are to be found in Dr. Goldsmith's works. 'I wished, then and there, to submit my manuscript to him.' I wished to do something there, and did not then wish that I had done something before."

Care must be taken that the times are attended to in using the active participle, or confusion will result. Thus, it is correct to say, "I intended to have gone (not to go) to New York before my wife arrived from Europe."

he, her, etc. See be and case for remarks on the use of pronouns with the verb to be.

head. See score.

healthy. Be careful not to use this word where the intended meaning is healthful. Look up these two words in the regular vocabulary of this volume and study them carefully.

heap. Often colloquially used, and found in some good writers, for a great many, a crowd, etc. Its strictly correct meaning is a pile or mass, as in Dryden's "Huge heaps of slain around the body rise." But the Anglo-Saxon heap signified a crowd as well as a pile, so that there is at least ancient authority for the colloquialism, "a heap of people," and Robert Louis Stevenson was even better supported when he wrote "I have noticed a heap of things in my life." In the plural form, "heaps of friends, heaps of love, etc.," the colloquialism is not permissible.

hearth. Often mispronounced herth; should be harth.

heaven. The final syllable is short; it is hev′n, not hev′en.

height. Most everybody, young and old, make the error of pronouncing this word hiteth (one syllable); the correct pronunciation is hite. In fact height can spell nothing but hite.

heinous. Pronounced hay′nus, not he′nus.

help. Condemned by some critics when used in the sense of avoid, prevent, as is the common locution, I can't help it. Such a criticism, according to others, is a good example of a prim, precise treatment of language that would deprive it of all strength and flexibility. There is no better English, they say, than "I can't help it," which is a compact and homely way of saying "The matter is beyond my aid." We have Shakespeare's example:

"I cannot help it now,
Unless by using means I lame the foot Of our design."

Richard Grant White says: "The use of the word 'help' in this sense must be much older than Shakespeare's poetry. It is one of those quasi-idiomatic uses of words that are inevitable, that should not be unsettled, that indeed cannot be helped. There is no surer way to a weak, poor, artificial style than the sitting in judgment upon the use of words and phrases of spontaneous growth, which are not at variance with reason, and which have been used for centuries by all sorts and conditions of men. A man who uses language as Sampson, the valiant retainer of the Capulet, bit his thumb—only when he has the law on his side, will soon come to write like an attorney drawing a law paper."

helpmate, helpmeet. The former is generally preferred. Both forms are corruptions from the divine statement in Genesis, "I will make him an help meet for him," that is, fit or suitable for him. Many writers object to the use of either helpmate or helpmeet, the latter having been called a lamentable blunder. But the words have the sanction of authorities.

herculean. Accented on the second syllable her-ku′lean, not on the third.

hoist. Often mispronounced highst; should be hoyst.

hospitable. Accented on the first syllable, hos′pi-ta-bl; not hos-pit′a-bl.

how? Improperly used for "what?" as a request for repetition of something not clearly understood.

how. Misused for "that" in "I have heard how," unless the meaning is, "I have heard the manner in which," etc. "I have heard how you slept through the sermon" should be "I have heard that you slept."

how do? howdy? Colloquial contractions of "How do you do?" used only by careless speakers.

however, adv. Improperly used in "However could you do it?" which should be "How could you ever do it?" "However stupid one may be" is an example of correct use of the adverb.

however, conj. Should be distinguished in use from but, yet, notwithstanding, and nevertheless. All these conjunctions are termed adversative because they join sentences together that stand more or less in opposition to each other. However is the most indefinite; it serves as a conclusive deduction drawn from the whole. "The truth has, however, not yet all come out"; by this is understood that much of the truth has been told, and much yet remains to be told. However connects one or many propositions either expressed or understood. Yet, nevertheless, and notwithstanding are mostly employed to set two specific propositions either in contrast or direct opposition to each other; the latter two are but species of the former, pointing out the opposition in a more specific manner.

human. Commonly used colloquially for "a human being" and permissible though inelegant.

humanitarian. Properly distinguished from humane. The latter recognizes in a common humanity a bond of kindness, good will, and good offices. Humanitarian was originally applied in theology to one who denied the godhead of Christ and insisted upon his human nature. It serves no good purpose in its modern use for philanthropic, the word humane already covering that meaning perfectly. In the sense of pertaining to, possessing, or appealing to human nature, humanitarian is correctly used.

hundred. Avoid the common pronunciation hun'derd.

hydropathy. This is a badly-formed word, etymologically the opposite of that which it is intended to imply, but now established in the sense of water-cure. The composition of "hydropathy" has been called "a fine example of pretentious ignorance." It is formed of two Greek words signifying water and disease or suffering; that is, water-disease, instead of water-cure, for which it is used.

I

I. This is a very important letter, as it also is used as a word. It is often interchanged and misused with the word me. I should never be used as an objective, but it properly follows the verb "to be" as an apposite.

Me is always an objective. Say, "With you and me," not "with you and I," which is frequently heard from careless and ignorant speakers.

ice-cream, ice-water. "There are no such words," say some authorities, who contend in favor of "iced cream" and "iced water." But ice cream and ice water, as well as ice tea, are with us to remain, regardless of the objectors.

idea. Often mispronounced i'dee and i-de'ar. Misused in the sense of opinion, especially in England. "I have an idea that he is guilty," should be "I am of the opinion," etc. Such a locution has been called "a barbarous misuse of a word that is very expressive and beautiful as used by our old writers." Shakespeare never used the word as meaning an opinion, but frequently used it for a mental vision.

ideal. Pronounced with three full syllables, as spelled, i-de'al.

Ideal should be distinguished from imaginary. Ideal is not directly opposed to, but abstracted from, the real; the imaginary on the other hand, is directly opposed to the real; it is the unreal thing formed by the imagination. We all wish for ideal happiness; it is the happiness formed in the mind, which it may be possible to realize; imaginary happiness is that derived by a lunatic from the conceit of being a king.

idioms. Much of the strength of a language lies in its idioms and idiomatic phrases, the characteristics which differentiate it from all others, as the physical features of a man distinguish him from other men. An idiom is a mode of expression peculiar to a language, and is often untranslatable. The idioms in every language belong to its very structure, and are to be distinguished from its dialects, which are varieties of expression ingrafted upon it in different localities or by different professions.

idyl, idyll. Pronounced i'dil not 'idl.

i. e. Meaning "that is." Taken from the Latin phrase, id est; should not be used except in technical writing.

if. Misused for whether, in such cases as "Go and see if he will come," "I doubt if you will find him at home," though some good writers have used "if" in that manner.

"If I am, if I was, if he was," are often carelessly used when the subjunctive forms "If I be, if I were, if he were" are required for proper construction. The sense, the meaning of the whole sentence, always governs in such cases. "If it be dark, do not come home. If eating is necessary to man, he ought not to be a glutton." In the first of these sentences, the matter expressed by the verb may be or may not be. There exists an uncertainty on the subject. And if the sentence were filled up, it would stand thus: "If it should be dark, do not come home." But in the second sentence there exists no such uncertainty. We know, and all the world knows, that eating is necessary to man. We could not fill up the sentence with "should," and therefore we make use of "is." Thus, the conjunction "if," employed in both cases, has nothing at all to do with the government of the verb. It is the sense that governs.

There is great necessity for care as to this matter of the subjunctive mode; for the meaning of what we write is very much affected when we make use of the modes indiscriminately.

-ile. Most of the words with this suffix are pronounced with the i short, as missile, hostile, fertile, etc.

ill. Many speakers and writers limit the meaning of sick to the expression of qualmishness, sickness at the stomach, nausea, and are inclined to sneer at the use of "sick" for "ill," though the former (of Anglo-Saxon origin) is etymologically the better word, and has the sanction of good authority. Army officers have sick leave, invalids keep a sick-bed, or a sick-room.

illusion. Three words that may be studied together are illusion, allusion, and delusion. Look them up in the main vocabulary of this dictionary.

illustrate. Pronounced with the stress on the first syllable.

illy. The word is not in good use, ill itself being an adverb, so that the "y" of illy is superfluous. A thing is ill done or ill made, not illy.

immediately. Sometimes misused for "as soon as," in the same manner as "directly" is. A colloquialism for which there is little excuse. Im-me'di-ate-ly is often mispronounced im-me'jet-ly.

impetus. Accented on the first syllable, im'pe-tus, not on the second.

implacable. Pronounced im-pla'ka-bl, not im-plak'a-ble.

impropriety. Applied to an inaccuracy in language; a word or phrase not in accord with the established usages or principles of speaking or writing is an impropriety.

in, into. Commonly misused, through being carelessly interchanged. We do not properly "go in the house," but go "into" the house. One may be or stay in a room, but not come in a room. We come "into" a room or any other place.

We put things into a grip, not "in" a grip, but afterward say properly they are in. "I put my shoes into my trunk yesterday and they must be in it now." He "jumped in the water" should be "he jumped into the water." "The child fell into the well," not "in the well."

The wrong use of in and into is very common, even by good speakers.

in, on. We usually live "on" a street, and have a specific use for "in the street." "He stood in the street, gazing up at the houses," means that he stood in the roadway. Thus, we live "on" Fifth Avenue and watch a blockade in Fifth Avenue. Though opposed to old English custom to speak of living "on" a street, it finds a parallel in living "on" a farm.

inaugurate. Often used where open, set up, or establish would improve the diction. The president does not inaugurate a ball, but opens it, and peanut stands are set up or established, not inaugurated.

incomparable. Properly accented only on the second syllable, in-com'pa-ra-bl.

indention. A word distinct from indentation and in use by printers, as in "hanging indention." Indention is the setting of a line or lines farther in from the margin than others that precede and follow.

index. The English plural, indexes, is used when tables of contents, etc., are referred to, and the Latin plural, indices, should be left for the exclusive use of scientists.

indorse, endorse. Greatly overworked for approve or sanction. We indorse everything, from a candidate for Congress to a new cure-all. A successful actor is indorsed and so is a porous plaster, and when we indorse the latter we do not mean that we write on the back of it, but that we think well enough of it to stick it on our own backs. It would improve our diction to approve more and indorse less.

inexplicable. Accent on the second syllable, in-ex'pli-ka-bl.

inferior, superior. Used elliptically in such phrases as "an inferior person," "a superior education." The idea is "an inferior kind of person," etc. Such usage is well established, and is generally regarded as correct.

initiate. Often misused for the word begin.

in our midst. Objected to by many sticklers for propriety and barred from the columns of many newspapers by office rule.

The phrases "in our midst, in your midst, in their midst," are wrongly condemned as innovations, long having been used by many writers of repute. The weight of authority, however, is against them, preferring in the midst of us, or you, or them. "Where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them."

nquiry. Often mispronounced in'kwi-ri; should always be in-kwire'i.

n so far as. The "in" is superfluous and should be omitted.

nteresting. The stress is properly laid on the first syllable, in'ter-est-ing. Often mispronounced in-ter-est'ing.

ntrigue. Pronounced in-treeg', with the accent on the last syllable, not the first.

ntrude, intrusion. The meaning of "intrude" includes the idea of being unwelcome, hence it is redundant to speak of intruding "where one is not wanted." Where a man is welcome he does not "intrude."

nvest. Properly dignified with the meaning, to make an investment, to lay out in the purchase of some kind of property, and misused in such careless speech as "I invested in a haircut, or a bouquet."

nvite, n. A colloquialism for invitation. It is inelegant, unnecessary, and not sanctioned.

reparable. Accented only on the second syllable, ir-rep'a-ra-bl.

revocable. Pronounced ir-rev'o-ka-bl, not ir-re-voke'a-bl.

thmus. Pronounced is'mus, which is the common colloquial pronunciation.

. "Never put an 'it' upon paper without thinking well of what you are about," wrote Cobbett. "When I see many its in a page, I always tremble for the writer. The word 'it' is the greatest troubler that I know of in language. It is so small and so convenient that few are careful enough in using it. Writers seldom spare this word. Whenever they are at a loss for either a nominative or an objective to their sentence, they without any kind of ceremony, clap in an 'it.' "

Care must be taken that "it," when used, properly refers to the preceding words for which it is supposed to stand. The careless use of the word often results in errors.

alian. Often mispronounced I'tal-yan; should be it-al'yan.

alic. Accented on the second syllable, i-tal'ik; commonly mispronounced i'talik.

ory. Properly pronounced with three full syllables, i'vo-ri, not i'vri.

J

g. Another slang word so expressive as to meet with favor in all circles.

lap. Mispronounced jol'up; should be jal'ap.

opardize. Called by Richard Grant White "a monster frequently met with—a foolish and intolerable word, which has no rightful place in the language, although even such a writer as Charles Reade uses it."

But this word, like many others, has gained such recognition that objections to substituting it for the older verb jeopard has disappeared. It is argued in favor of "jeopardize" that the termination -ize aids in stamping it as a verb.

Jew. We speak properly of a congregation of Hebrews, a store kept by a Jew, and an Israelite descended from Abraham. Hebrew is used with reference to the race and religion, Israelite with reference to the Jews as a people or nation, and Jew is the name in English, as Spaniard is of a native of Spain.

jewelry. Properly used only of jewels in general, not of any particular jewels. "There are my jewels," said the mother of the Gracchi, not "these are my jewelry." A jeweler's stock is jewelry; a woman wears her "jewels" to the opera, not her jewelry.

jocund. Pronounced jok'und, not jo'kund.

join issue. When we "join issue" with a person, we engage or take part in an issue with him; when we take "issue" with him, we deny his proposition. The two phrases must not be confounded.

jolly. As a slang term this word is not acceptable.

josh. Another slang word that should not be sanctioned by good speakers.

journal. From the original meaning of this word, "a daily record," the broader sense, "a record of any kind," has been developed. "Journal" is now applied to almost any kind of periodical publication, and is used absolutely for a newspaper, so that we now say "this journal is published daily" without exciting criticism. Formerly this would have been equal to saying, "this daily is published daily."

journalist. Some of those whom this word strictly fits now rise in protest against its application to them. Many writers for the daily newspapers—strictly speaking, the only true "journalists," disclaim their right and title to the name. Some say they prefer to be called "newspaper men," affecting to leave their rightful name of journalist to the writers for weekly and monthly publications. "Journalism" is indisputably the proper name for a useful and honorable branch of the profession of letters, and all who practice that branch of the profession are rightly called journalists. To surrender the title "journalist" for "newspaperman" is to sell one's birthright for a mess of pottage. Lawyers might, with equal propriety, call themselves "law men" on the ground that they have to share the good old title "lawyer" with men who do not practice in this or that particular kind of legal services.

jowl. The pronunciation "jole" is preferred.

jugular. Pronounced ju'gu-lar, not jug'-u-lar.

just. Often mispronounced jest or jist by the careless and ignorant.

juvenile. Often mispronounced. Should be ju've-nil—short i.

K

kept. Should be pronounced with the final t, kept, not kep.

kettle. Often mispronounced kit'l.

kidding. With so many good words in our language, there is no excuse for using this one, as in "Stop your kidding."

kids. Should not be used for kid gloves. We have appropriated the word to another use and speak of children as kids.

kinder. A vulgarism for "kind of," often itself misused.

kindergarten. Often mispronounced kindergarden; the final syllable is -ten.

kindness. May be used either in the singular or in the plural, kindnesses. A single act of abstract kindness is "a kindness," and several such acts are properly "kindnesses."

kind of. "What kind of man do you like?" is correct, but "what kind of a man" is incorrect, the a being superfluous. "I'm kind of sorry," for "I am somewhat sorry," is a colloquialism not confined to country districts. Careful speakers do not use it. The same remarks apply to "sort of."

kinsman. Should be used oftener. "A hearty English word, full of manhood and warm blood," but rarely heard in modern speech, the weaker "relative" or "connection" being substituted. In losing "kinsman," says a learned writer, we lose also his frank, sweet-lipped sister, "kinswoman," and are obliged to give her place to that poor, ill-made-up Latin interloper, "female relation."

kitchen. The last syllable should not be clipped; it is kitch'en, not kich'n.

knight. Care should be taken in pluralizing phrases containing knight. When another noun is joined to knight, as in Knight Templar, both elements take the plural; thus, Knights Templars, knights commanders. But when an adjective forms the second part of the phrase, as in knight errant, the noun only takes the plural, knights errant.

knock. This word in the slang sense cannot be approved, except for its expressiveness.

knowledge. Formerly sometimes pronounced no'lej; now always nol'ej.

lady. This word is correctly used as the correlative of "gentleman," and rarely misused by ladies or gentlemen. But the word is sadly abused by ladies and gentlemen who are neither, as "gentleman" is by the man who insists upon informing you that he is "always a gentleman," even though he is not.

"Lady" is used in many cases where "woman" or "wife" are demanded by good taste and correct diction. Used merely to indicate sex, it is a vulgarism. "Salesperson" has been adopted by some large commercial establishments in place of the much-discussed "saleslady," and "washlady" happily has dropped out of the race for recognition. A woman is never more truly a lady than when she properly calls herself a woman, and never less truly a lady than when she voices a claim to the gentle title.

lambast. Nobody seems to know where this word came from, or its exact meaning. We lambast a man when we severely criticise him; when we whip a horse we lambast it; and in a friendly boxing match the victor lambasted his opponent. At best the word is not required, even in slang.

lamentable. Mispronounced la-men'ta-bl; should be lam'en-ta-bl.

languid. The first syllable is lang' and the word is properly pronounced lang'-gwid. So with languor—lang'gwor.

laryngitis. Mispronounced lar-in-je'tis; should be lar-in-ji'tis.

last, latter. Last, as a superlative, cannot be used properly of two only, while latter, as a comparative, should not be used of more than two.

Latin. Pronounced lat'in, not lat'n.

latter end. Avoided by the best modern speakers and writers, who prefer "last days," etc.

laugh. Pronounced lahf, not laf.

law. Not lawr, which is a common colloquial pronunciation heard too frequently as idear is of idea.

lay, lie. Often wrongly interchanged. We lie down for a rest, not lay down, but we correctly say "Now I lay me down to sleep," for we lay things down, not lie them down. Lay, in this sense, is always transitive; lie is always intransitive.

The number of those who misuse lie and lay is legion, but the fault is inexcusable and the greatest care should be taken to make the proper distinction between these two verbs.

In the past tenses also, "laid" and "lay" are often confused. The former is the preterit of lay, and the latter of lie. Say, "I laid the child down," not "I lay the child down," and "I lay down on the lounge," not "I laid down on the lounge."

learn. Often misused for "teach." We do not "learn a child its letters" but "teach a child its letters." The child learns, as we teach. To teach is to transmit knowledge, to learn is to receive it.

learned. Pronounced in two syllables when used as an adjective; thus, "a learn'ed lawyer"; but in one syllable when used as a verb; thus, "she learned with ease."

leave. Such expressions as "Leave me be," "Leave me see it," are vulgarisms for which there is no excuse. Say, "Let me be," etc. Some have objected to the use of "leave" without an object in such sentences as "He leaves tomorrow," but the usage is sanctioned by good writers.

legislature. Accented on the first syllable and pronounced lej'is-late-yur, not lej-is-late'yur. So with legislator and legislative.

lengthened. Often misused for lengthy or long. Lengthened is properly used of a thing only when its original length has been added to. A long table is lengthened by an addition in the middle or at either end, but unless such an addition had been made it would be incorrect to speak of it as a lengthened table. A long sermon is not necessarily a lengthened sermon; on the other hand, a short sermon is lengthened when the preacher discourses at greater length than usual.

lengthy. Properly used in the sense of "immoderately long," and often misused when "long" is preferable. "A long debate" is better than "a lengthy debate."

lengthways. Lengthwise is the better form.

lesser. This word may be used with the sense of "minor" in such phrases as "the lesser prophets, the lesser poets." It is also sometimes used with propriety instead of "less," especially in verse. We may say, "Of two evils, choose the less" or "the lesser."

lethargic Accented on the second syllable, leth-ar'gic.

liable. Compare this word with the word likely in the main vocabulary of this dictionary, and you will not be so likely to use them incorrectly.

lick. You did not lick him, but you did whip him. Do not use the word lick in such a sense.

licorice. Often mispronounced lik'er-ish; should be lik'o-ris.

lift, raise. Should not be confounded in meaning. To lift is to take up from a given spot by a direct application of force; to raise is to cause to rise. We lift a stool with our hands, we raise a stool by giving it longer legs.

like. The confusion of this word with the word as, often produces obscurity of diction. They both express similarity, but "like" compares things, while "as" compares action or existence. We may say correctly, John is like James, or John is such a man as James is; but not "John is as James," or "John is such a man like James is."

"Like" is often misused for "as though"; thus, "It looks like it would rain" should be "as though it would rain."

lilac. Often mispronounced li'lok; should be li'lak.

limb, leg. "A squeamishness, which I am really ashamed to notice, leads many persons to use this word [limb] exclusively instead of leg. Heaven help such folk; they are far out of my reach."—Richard Grant White.

limited. "A man of limited means" should be preferably "a man of small means." The loose use of "limited" for low, small, slight, or slender is not correct.

listen. Do not begin your sentences with "Listen!" The use of this word in this manner becomes tiresome, as do also the objectionable phrases, "I say!" "Look here!"—often used "Looky here!"

loan, lend. Lend is the preferable form of the verb. Say, "Lend me your auto," not "Loan me."

look. The verb look, applied to a person's appearance, takes the adjective, not the adverb. Thus we say correctly, "She looks charming," not "charmingly." One looks sweet, beautiful, handsome, or graceful, as the case may be. We do not say "She looks sweetly," any more than "She looks sadly."

lot and lots. Used colloquially in the same way as heap and heaps. The plural form is usually condemned as inelegant.

love, like. The former is often carelessly used for the latter. We do not "love" candy, we like it. But "I just love chocolate" is one of the commonest of phrases. Careful speakers will not fail to distinguish properly between the two words, each of which has an important place.

lovely. Everything is "lovely," and they who say it should be placed with the goose that "hangs high." Lovely is one of the most abused words in the language. There are fair enthusiasts who find little pigs "lovely" as well as pug dogs. Their automobiles are lovely, and they have "lovely times" in them. They have lovely lawns and "perfectly lovely" neighbors, and they seem unconscious of the fact that the last use of the word is the only legitimate one.

Lovely properly means lovable, charming, and is correctly applied only to persons. In regrettable colloquial use it is now applied less to persons than to things, and we have lovely houses, lovely farms, and even lovely animals low-priced. To be distinguished from cheap. A thing is low-priced when it is of small price, when its cost is low. It is cheap when it is to be had at a bargain. A gold watch may cost a great deal of money, but is cheap if the price be lower than one might expect.

lurid. The light may be bright, but it is not lurid unless it is dull and ghastly—which few writers realize.

luxurious. Now rarely used as a synonym for luxuriant. Luxurious pertains to luxury, luxuriant is abundant or exuberant in growth.

lyceum. Accented on the second syllable, ly-se'um, not the first.

mackerel. Pronounced in three syllables, mak'er-el, not mak'rel.

mad. Colloquially much used in the sense of "angry," though not by careful speakers. "Angry" is always to be preferred, leaving "mad" to signify foolish, insane. But the use of "mad" to express anger is no mere modern colloquialism. Shakespeare uses it in "The Merchant of Venice." Also in the Bible we find King James's translators placing the stamp of their approval upon the verse, "And being exceedingly mad against them, I persecuted them even unto strange cities," which is unchanged in the Revised Version.

magnificent. Be careful not to use this word too freely—likewise the words gorgeous, majestic, grand, and others of a similar character.

maintenance. Often mispronounced main-tain'ans; should be main'te-nans.

majority. Often misused for most. "Most of us are willing" is usually better than "the majority of us."

make. Used as a colloquialism for earn, gain, "make" is not sanctioned. The legitimate verbs are preferred.

marital. Properly applied only to a husband ("his marital rights"), the word being from Latin maritus, a husband. Distinguished from matrimonial, which refers to both husband and wife, or to marriage generally.

maritime. Pronounced mar'i-tim, not mar'i-time. The a is short as in pat.

marjoram. Accented on the first syllable, mar'jo-ram, not on the second.

masculine. The vowel sound in the final syllable is short, mas'ku-lin.

matron. Pronounced ma'trun, not mat'-run; matronal is mat'run-al, or ma'-trun-al; and matronly is always ma'-trun-ly.

mausoleum. Accented on the third syllable mau-so-le'um, not the second.

mayor. Properly pronounced may'or with two syllables. The pronunciation "mayr" is common.

medicine. Pronounced in three syllables, med'i-sin; not two, med'sin.

mercantile. Pronounced mer'kan-til, not mer-kan-teel'.

merely. Misused for simply. Merely means solely; "She sings merely to amuse herself." Simply means of itself, without regard to anything else; "Your story is simply amazing."

mesmerize. Some orthoepists pronounce this word mes'mer-ize, but it is commonly mez'mer-ize.

middling. A common colloquialism for fairly, tolerably, as in "a middling good meal." Middling is not an adverb, and cannot be used for one.

mighty. Commonly used as an equivalent of "very" in such phrases as mighty well, mighty hard, mighty wise, etc. It is an old colloquialism, but should be avoided.

mineralogy. Often wrongly pronounced min-erol'ogy.

minute. Compare this word with the word moment in the regular vocabulary section.

mischievous. Often mispronounced mis-chee'vi-us and mis-chee'vus; should be mis'chi-vus.

misplaced words. In the construction of sentences it is of the highest importance to give each word and clause its proper place. Misplacement is one of the most common of all the errors in writing and speaking. All the words may be the proper words to be used upon the occasion, as William Cobbett points out, and yet, by a misplacing of a part of them the meaning may be wholly destroyed, and even made to be the contrary of what it ought to be. The difference between "The steak should properly be broiled" and "The steak should be properly broiled" will be understood.

mistaken. "You are mistaken," in the sense of "you are wrong," is a locution that has caused many battles among the critics. It has been attacked on the ground of possible confusion with "mistaken" in its sense of taken amiss, misunderstood. Its defenders assert that "You are mistaken" is less direct and censorius than "You are wrong," and hence less offensive. They admire its euphemistic character, and have given it the sanction of their authority. Its use is so general for "You are wrong" that there is no possibility of mistaking the meaning. "You are in error" is preferred by some purists.

moisten. Pronounced mois'n, not -ten.

monarchical. Often mispronounced and misspelled. It is mo-nahr'kik-al, not mo-nahr'ki-al.

mongrel. Pronounced mung'grel, not mong'grel.

morale. Not mor'al, but mo-rahl'.

most. Often used for almost, but the colloquialism is inadmissible. "I was most dead from fatigue" is unpardonable. "Most every day" is often heard for "nearly every day," but only in the mouths of the careless or ignorant.

Used as an intensive in such phrases as "a most profound silence," "it was most extraordinary," most is less desirable than "very." "Everybody abuses this word," says Gould. "If a man would cross out 'most' wherever he can find it in any book in the English language, he would in 'almost' every instance improve the style of the book."

move you. In the sentence, "Mr. Chairman, I move you," the "you" is unnecessary and superfluous. We do not in any sense move the chairman; we move the resolution; that is, we offer it.

much. Do not use the term muchly for the good word much.

municipal. Mispronounced mu-ni-sip'-al; should be mu-nis'i-pal.

museum. Pronounced mu-ze'um, not mu'ze-um. The accent is on the second syllable.

mushroom. Often mispronounced mush'-room; the final syllable is -room.

muskmelon. Often mispronounced mush'mel-un, which is an objectionable corruption of the word. The first syllable is musk'.

mutual. Often objected to in the phrase "our mutual friend," of which Macaulay says: "Mutual friend is a low vulgarism for common friend." Without going quite so far, it may be said that mutual, as qualifying friend, though it has been frequently used in literature, is objectionable on the ground that mutual properly expresses reciprocity or community of feeling or action, and therefore should not be joined with such a word as friend. Common is the proper adjective to use. Those who use the phrase, however, are in good company, namely, that of Sterne, Burke, Shakespeare, Milton, Dickens, Lytton, and others.

Mutual applies mostly to matters of will and opinion; as, a mutual affection, a mutual interest or concern. It signifies exchanged so as to be equal, or the same, on both sides. Our joint, or common friends may have mutual confidences.

naive. Pronounced nah-eve', not nave.

nape. Mispronounced nap; the a is long, nape.

nasty. Offensive when used in the sense of disagreeable. "This word, at best not well suited to dainty lips," says White, "is of late years shockingly misused by British folk who should be ashamed of such defiled English. . . . For hardly three other English words are so nearly the same in meaning as dirty, filthy, and nasty; of which the last expresses the greatest offense to all the senses.

national. Often mispronounced na'-shun-al; should be nash'un-al.

nature. Pronounced na'tyur. The pure sound of t should be preserved in this word, though the best and most careful speakers frequently pronounce the last syllable as though it were -choor.

necessitated. Often used when required, compelled or obliged would improve the diction.

neighborhood, vicinity. These words are not synonyms, though sometimes regarded as interchangeable. Neighborhood is employed in reference to inhabitants, to denote nearness of persons to each other or to objects in general; but vicinity is used to denote nearness of one object to another, whether person or thing; hence, we may say a quiet neighborhood, and to be "in the neighborhood," either as it respects the people or the country; but we say, in the vicinity of a factory, or of the city.

neither . . . nor. When these correlatives are employed to connect singular nominatives, care should be taken that they are followed by a singular verb; thus, "Neither John nor I were at church" should be "was at church."

nerve. Not a good word to use in its slang sense when there are so many legitimate words that are far more expressive.

neuralgia. Correctly pronounced in four syllables, nu-ral'ji-a, not nu-ral'ja, nor nu-ral'jy.

never. Often misused for "not" in such sentences as "He was never born there."

nice. Generally misapplied, in the sense of pleasing or agreeable. Such colloquial use of the word as in "a nice day, a nice sermon, a nice play," was condemned by Archdeacon Hare as stupid vulgarism due to sheer poverty of thought or fear of saying anything definite. Nice is a good word when properly applied and we speak with propriety and force of a nice taste, a nice distinction, etc. To talk of "a nice man" is considered childish.

nicety. Pronounced in three syllables, ni'se-ti, not nise'ti. "In this word of our own composition from nice," says Walker, "we have unaccountably run into the pronunciation of the mute e."

nohow. A vulgar colloquialism for "in any way," "not at all," etc.

In some literary establishments there is an iron-clad rule that "none" shall always take a singular verb, but the flexible English language should not be weakened thus and resents such unnecessary restraint.

nor, or. Or is frequently misused for nor after the negative no in sentences like the following: "He has no sheep or cattle," which should be "no sheep nor cattle." We hear such expressions as "Pride nor anger becomes a man" and are left to infer that the first word is negatived elliptically. In most of such cases the negative "nor" is not sufficient to make the meaning perfectly clear and the construction must therefore be regarded as defective. It is better always to supply the missing "neither"—"Neither pride nor anger becomes a man."

nothing like. Often misused for "not nearly." "She is nothing like as pretty as her sister" should be "She is not nearly so pretty," etc.

no use. "It is no use" should be "It is of no use."

nuisance. Often mispronounced noo'-sans; should be niu'sans.

number. The rules of grammar and good construction demand that pronouns and verbs shall always agree in number with their antecedents or subjects. Plural pronouns must not be used when their antecedents are singular. "A person must be very short if they can't see over that wall" is incorrect; "if he can't see" corrects the error.

A common error is the wrong use of the verb to be as regards number. "There is four of us" should be "there are four," etc. In the colloquial form, "There's just four of us," we find a very familiar misuse of number. Careful speakers will avoid all such errors.

The pronouns each and every govern the singular number. Say, "each of them studies" not "each of them study."

nut. This word has its legitimate uses, and it should not be used in its slang sense. However "nutty" one may be, there is a better term to express it.

O

O and oh. These two forms are properly distinguished in use. In direct address we use O with a noun, as: O John, come here. No punctuation follows O. In expressions of joy, pain, surprise, etc., we use oh, as: Oh, how beautiful the mountain is!

When the sentence as a whole is exclamatory a comma follows oh and an exclamation point is used at the end; otherwise this is the correct punctuation: Oh! I forgot my camera.

O is always a capital, but oh is capitalized only at the beginning of a sentence. Examples: We made the trip; and, oh, how enjoyable it was! Oh! Have I hurt you? Come, O men of iron will. O yes, I understand.

oaths. Pronounced with the th hard, as in those.

obesity. Pronounced o-bes'i-ti, not o-be'-si-ti.

occult. Accented on the final syllable, ok-kult'.

of. There is a certain ambiguity about the meaning of "of" in phrases like "the love of woman" which may be obviated by using another preposition, as "for" or "to," or by transposing the phrase to read "woman's love," if that be the meaning. The love of woman may signify either the love of a woman for another or the love of a man for her. If the former is meant, we can substitute "woman's love"; if the latter, we can say "love for a woman" or "love for woman," and thus convey the meaning intended.

of all others. Erroneous sentences like the following are frequently met with in speech and writing: "Ingratitude is a trait of character of all others the most censurable." Here the meaning is "Ingratitude is the most censurable of all traits of character that are censurable," and the sentence might read with propriety: "Ingratitude is the worst of all the censurable traits of character." When we say "of all others," we mean of all others beside the one spoken of, and the one spoken of is not one of the others. It is better in all cases to transpose the sentence than to employ "of all others."

When we carelessly say "of all others," we usually mean "of all." Thus, "Lincoln was the president, of all others, nearest to the people," means "Of all the presidents, Lincoln was nearest to the people."

of any. Often misused for "of all." "The greatest of any I have seen," should be "the greatest of all" or "greater than any other," etc.

official. Often misused for officer. An official is properly a subordinate executive officer, and the word is not strictly applicable to all officers.

off of. Always a specimen of redundancy. In "a pound of chops off of the loin," the "of" is superfluous. In "a yard off of a piece of silk," either "off" or "of" should be omitted. In "Get off of the horse," "of" is not needed.

often. Pronounced of'n, not of'ten.

ld veteran. A phrase to be avoided as a pleonasm. "Veteran" implies length of service, and when length of days as well as length of service is to be expressed it is better to say "aged veteran."

n, upon. Upon has the special significance of resting on, being at or in contact with the upper or outer part of a thing. It may be said to be synonymous with "on" in all its senses, and to be interchangeable with it, the choice of the writer or speaker seeming to determine the use of the word. Upon is sometimes written as two words; thus, "Can you climb up on the roof?"

"In writing prose," says Ayres, "we could get on very well if there were no such word as upon."

ne. The useful indefinite "one" should not be followed in the same sentence by a substitute "he" or "her," and especially not by "they." Say, "One may choose one's own road," not "one may choose his, or her, own road," and especially not "one may choose their own road." The latter is a common error.

When a statement begins with "one," the repetition of "one" and its derivatives is always preferred to the admission of the pronouns; that is, the impersonal form of "one" must be retained throughout. Thus, "one may not be able to choose one's walk in life, but one may always choose one's companions, and has only oneself to blame for a wrong choice." Better construction often results when the sentence begins "A person," followed by his, her, etc., but the matter must be left to individual judgment.

nerous. Pronounced on'er-us, not o'ner-us.

nes. Objection has been made to the use of "ones" in phrases like "The horses are very fine ones."

"In all such cases," says one writer, "ones is superfluous. The same word, in the singular and in the plural, is often made to do duty for some other term when that other term should be used. The avoidance of repetition is of course at times desirable, but it is frequently proper to repeat a word that occurs in a preceding sentence, particularly if ambiguity would be the result of not doing so."

"He was a man of very different abilities and character from the ones that have succeeded him," should be "from the men," etc.

only. Many errors are made by misplacing "only" in a sentence. In this respect it is one of the most sadly abused words of the language. The worst errors are such as obscure the meaning of the speaker or writer, or make the sentence ridiculous. In the sentence "His ears only caught the happiest remarks," the writer does not intend to convey the impression that the subject was deaf except when happy remarks were made, or that "the happiest remarks" were caught only by the ears. The meaning is, "His ears caught only the happiest remarks."

It is almost impossible to prescribe rules that shall govern the admission of "only" into English sentences. The difficulty of the task is no reflection upon the genius of the language, but rather a proof of its flexibility. In his Higher English Grammar Dr. Bain has addressed himself to the subject as follows:

"According to the position of only, the same words may be made to express very different meanings. 'He only lived for their sakes.' Here only must be held as qualifying 'lived for their sakes,' the emphasis being on lived, and the word immediately adjoining. The meaning then is, 'he lived,' but did not work, did not die, did not do any other thing for their sakes.

" 'He lived only for their sakes.' Only now qualifies 'for their sakes,' and the sentence means, he lived for this one reason, for their sakes, and not for any other reason.

" 'He lived for their sakes only.' The force of the word when placed at the end is peculiar. Then it often has diminutive or disparaging signification. 'He lived for their sakes,' and not for any more worthy reason. 'He gave sixpence only,' is an insinuation that more was expected."

As a general rule it may be said that "only" should be placed next to the word or phrase that it is intended to qualify, and care must be taken that there is no other word or phrase before or after to which "only" may also refer to render the sentence ambiguous.

onto. In a certain colloquial use this word is a vulgarism; as, "A ring with a beautiful set onto it." But it has grown in favor as a junction of on and to in such phrases as "The aeronaut fell onto the roof." "The window opened onto a pleasant lawn."

on yesterday. The "on" is always superfluous and inelegant.

orate. Is only for the humorists when they describe the speech of a bombastic orator. It belongs to the same class as "resolute," to adopt resolutions, and is fittingly used with "hot air" and similar slang.

orchid. Pronounced or'kid, not or'chid.

ordeal. Commonly and erroneously accented on the second syllable, or-de'al; should be or'de-al.

ordinance. Compare this word with the word ordnance in the main vocabulary section.

ordinary. A good word, but its contraction into the word "ornary" never can be forgiven. The latter should never be used.

ou, ow. Mispronounced in various localities, as "kaow" for cow, "abaout" for about. Careful speakers will always avoid such provincialisms.

over. Often used instead of "more than," a preferable locution; as "We walked over a mile" should be "more than."

over and above. "More than" is the preferable phrase in such sentences as "Over and above that, I say." The colloquial use in "He's not over and above bright" is not permissible.

overflown. "The river has overflown its banks" is incorrect. Should be "overflowed." Flown is the past participle of to fly, and not of to flow. There is no such word as overflown.

over his signature. In modern parlance a man writes "under" or "over" his signature. "Under" is the older form, and is always used in such phrases as "He writes under the signature of, etc." We do not say "Mr. Clemens wrote over the signature of Mark Twain."

Various reasons have been advanced for and against the use of "over one's signature." Most of the objections seem to have been prompted by prejudice.

own. Even though some good writers and speakers use "own up" for the good word "confess," it should not be sanctioned.

pack. Do not use this word for the word carry, even though it is not incorrect.

pair. See remarks under score.

pal. Not considered refined, but doubtless this word is as good as the word "chum," which has the same meaning.

panacea. This word means a universal medicine and it is therefore pleonastic to speak of "a universal panacea."

pantomime. The last syllable is often mispronounced -mine; should be -mime.

papyrus. Not pap'i-rus, but pa-pi'rus, with the long i.

paradox. The word means "something seemingly absurd," hence, to speak of "a seeming paradox" is pleonastic. We may say either "It is a paradox" or "It seems an absurdity."

paresis. Often mispronounced pa-re'sis; should be par'e-sis.

partake. Often misused for the simple verb to eat. Said Richard Grant White:

"Say that you 'ate' your breakfast or your dinner, not that you partook of some rolls and butter and coffee, or of beef and pudding. Although, if you are at breakfast when a friend comes in, you may ask him, if you like the phrase, to sit down and partake of it, i.e., take a part of it, share it with you."

partially. In many cases partly is more correctly used. A thing is not partially, but partly, done.

partner. Often mispronounced pard'ner, which is slangily contracted into pard. Should be part'ner.

partridge. Mispronounced pat'rij; should be part'rij.

party. Often misused for person, though correctly used in legal documents or of litigants. "I saw a party" for a person, is in bad taste.

passive. In the sentence "John was given an apple" is the root of a controversy that has long divided the grammarians. "This sort of phraseology is exceedingly vicious," say the writers on one side, "and it is hard to understand the depravity of its invention. It seems that an apple was given to John; yet the infernal ingenuity of the inventors contrives to frame a sentence in which there are two nominatives and only one singular verb."

Other writers condone the use of the passive form thus, saying "John," in the sentence quoted, must be understood to be the dative case, the sentence being equivalent to "An apple was given (to) John," but they will not sanction the form "He was given an apple," which again is accepted by some critics on the ground of wide usage, though they do not formally approve it. "An apple was given him" is the form preferred.

Care should be exercised in the use of the passive, in order to avoid such errors as are seen in the following examples: "I was given one of the offices"; "For every scratch I have been given he has two scars"; "Aliens have always been refused a vote."

In the reconstruction of sentences involving an incorrect use of the passive lies the safety of the careful speaker and writer. It is better to choose a different form of expression than to lay oneself open to the charge of being ungrammatical.

past. Often misused for last. The past week, the past year, the past twenty years, are often improved by substituting last for past, and the meaning is more clearly conveyed.

athos. Often misused and should be looked up in the regular vocabulary. Also look up the word bathos.

atronage. Misused for custom, as patron is for customer. We do not properly "patronize" a man when we buy from him. He is not dependent upon our favor.

eony. Mispronounced pi'o-ni and pi'ni; should be pe'o-ni.

eople, persons. Good writers always discriminate between "people" and "persons." Either may be used to express a small number of individuals; the word people, however, is always considered as one undivided body, while "person" may be distinctly used in either the singular or the plural. We should not say one, two, three, or four people; but we may say one, two, three, or four persons; yet on the other hand we may indifferently say, such people or persons; many people or persons; some people or persons.

"People" is used in general propositions and "persons" in those which are specific, or which refer directly to some particular individuals; thus we say, people are generally of that opinion; some people think so; some people attended; there were but few persons present; the whole company consisted of six persons.

As the term people is employed to designate the promiscuous multitude, much the same as the public, it has acquired a certain meanness which makes it less suitable to some than the word persons. When we say, "I do not know who the people are," it is not so respectful as to say, "I do not know who those persons are." In like manner we say, "Nothing else is to be expected from people of that stamp" and "Persons of their respectable appearance do not frequent such places."

In the senses of the community, the nation, the commonwealth, and the public, "people" is very much overworked, especially by politicians whose interest in "the people" is their means of support.

er. Improperly joined to English words. We say per diem, not per day, per annum, not per year. Such expressions as "per your letter, per invoice," etc., are commercial colloquialisms and are without sanction.

ercent. Although this is two words in the original Latin, per centum, it is now in such constant use that it should be used as one word, percent, without the sign of abbreviation in general use.

erfect. Can "perfect" be compared with propriety? Can we say more perfect and most perfect? The question has long occupied the minds of the critics and custom seems to have decided it in the affirmative. "He spoke in the most perfect silence." "There never was a more perfect day."

perhaps. Two syllables, per-haps'; not praps.

permit, allow. Not always interchangeable. "Permit" implies formal consent, "allow" tacit consent.

personalty. To be distinguished from personality. Personalty is one's personal estate, personality one's personal characteristics.

perspicuity, perspicacity. These words are often confounded, though very different in meaning. Perspicuity is clearness, freedom from obscurity or ambiguity, and denotes that quality of writing or speech which readily presents to the mind of another the precise ideas of the author.

Perspicacity is the quality of being quick-sighted or acute in discernment, and while both words may be applied to diction, they represent very different qualities.

perspiration. Mispronounced pres'pi-ration; should be per'spi-ra-tion.

peruse. Often used when the simpler word "read" should be preferred.

phenomena. The singular form is phenomenon, and the plural should never be used for the singular.

piano. Vulgarly mispronounced py'an-o; should be pi-an'o. The plural is pianos, not pianoes.

piece. Misused in such sentences as "I walked with him a piece." An undesirable colloquialism.

place. We do not go "some place," but "to some place," or "somewhere." The use of place without the preposition is unpardonable colloquialism.

plead. A colloquial preterit and participle "plead (pled)" is often heard, but the best speakers say "He pleaded guilty"; "They might have pleaded justification."

plenty. Much used colloquially as an adjective, in the sense of plentiful. Dr Campbell, in his Philosophy of Rhetoric, says, "Plenty for plentiful appears to me so gross a vulgarism that I should not have thought it worthy of a place here if I had not sometimes found it in works of considerable merit."

"Prairie chickens are plentiful" is better than "Prairie chickens are plenty."

pleonasm. Redundancy, or pleonasm, generally weakens diction, and should be guarded against. It is simply defined as the use of more words than are necessary to express ideas. To speak of "returning back again" is pleonastic, the word return including the sense of back and again.

plurals. The proper formation of the plural number of nouns is very important, and certain general rules governing the plural of both nouns and pronouns should be mastered by all who aim to write correctly. Even the elementary rules of number are often transgressed. William Cobbett stated these rules with simplicity and force, as follows:

1. The singular is the original word; and, in general, the plural is formed by adding an s to the singular. But there are many nouns that do not form their plurals in this simple manner, while there are some that have no plural number at all, and some that have no singular. Therefore, considering the above to be the first rule, others may be added with regard to the nouns that do not follow that rule.

2. Nouns, the singular numbers of which end in ch, s, sh, or x, require "es" to be added in order to form their plural number; as, church, churches; brush, brushes; fox, foxes.

3. Nouns that end in y, when the y has a consonant coming immediately before it, change the y into ies in forming their plurals; as, quantity, quantities. But if the y be not immediately preceded by a consonant, the words follow the first rule, and take only an s in addition to their singular, as day, days. It is very common to see even persons of liberal education making the error of writing vallies, vollies, attornies, and the like.

4. Nouns that end in a single f, or in fe, form their plurals by changing the f or fe into ves; as loaf, loaves; wife, wives. But this rule has exceptions in the following words, which follow the first rule: Dwarf, scarf, mischief, handkerchief, chief, relief, grief.

5. The following nouns have their plural in -en: man, men; woman, women; ox, oxen; child, children; and brethren is used sometimes as the plural of brother.

6. All nouns that nature, or art, or habit has made plural have no singular as, ashes, annals, bellows, bowels, thanks, breeches, entrails, lungs, scissors, snuffers, tongs, wages, and some others. There are also some nouns that have no plurals, such as those that express the qualities or propensities or feelings of the mind or heart; as, honesty, meekness, compassion. There are, further, several names of herbs, metals, minerals, liquids, and of fleshy substances, that have no plurals; to which may be added the names of almost all sorts of grain. There are exceptions here, for while wheat has no plural, oats has seldom any singular.

Then there are some words that are too irregular in the forming of their plurals to be brought under any distinct head even of irregularity. These include die, dice; mouse, mice; louse, lice; deer, deer; tooth, teeth, and foot, feet.

Compound words generally form their plural by pluralizing the second element; thus, hoop-skirts, hop-poles.

Personal pronouns must be made to agree with their antecedents in number. It is an error to say "A person must be very near sighted if they cannot see across the street." "They" should be "he" or "she."

When singular nouns are preceded by each, every, or no, the verb must be singular. Thus we say, "Every man and every woman goes to church," not "go" to church. "Each day and each hour counts in life," not "count." "Each" always takes a singular verb or pronoun; thus, "Each of them is happy," "Each man has his place."

"When the nominative is a relative pronoun we must look to the antecedent in order to determine the number of the verb." The following sentences exemplify errors that are often made:

"One of the first writers that comes to mind," should be "that come to mind." The verb agrees with "writers," not "one."

"One of the best books that has ever been published," should be "have ever been published."

"She gave him in return one of those smiles that closely resembles a sneer," should be "resemble."

Singular forms of the verb "to be" are frequently misused for the plural. Thus, the educated ear is offended daily by the question "How many is there?" or by such statements as "There was three or four of us." The plural verbs are, were, etc., are required in all such cases.

Physics, economics, dietetics, and other similar nouns, though plural in form, are regarded as singular, and take the singular verb; thus, physics is a delightful study; athletics is beneficial to health; mathematics is an exact science.

It is correct to say, "This seven years has passed"; "This hundred dollars is there"; the seven years being taken as forming one period of time, and the hundred dollars one sum of money.

As a general rule, collective nouns—those nouns which have both the singular and the plural form, as number, crowd—require a singular verb with their singular form, and a plural verb with their plural form. However, the plural verb may be used with the singular form when the idea of plurality is to be very prominent.

poem. Often mispronounced pome; should be two full syllables po'em.

poetess. Unnecessarily used for a woman poet. Poet is of either gender. Say, "she is a poet," not "a poetess."

poignant, poignancy. The g is silent, the pronunciation being poin'ant, poin'-an-si.

police. Accented on the last syllable, po-lese' not the first.

politics. Use this word as singular, as "The man's politics is," not are.

portion. Often misused for part. "A large portion of the street is blocked" should be "a large part," etc.

"Brown & Smith's business" is correct, but not "Brown and Smith's wives," which should be expressed "The wives of Brown and Smith."

Hers, theirs, your, etc., are sometimes written erroneously with an apostrophe, her's, their's, etc.

When the noun that is in the possessive case is expressed by a circumlocution, that is by many words in lieu of one, says Cobbett, the sign of the possessive case is properly joined to the last word: as, "John, the old farmer's, wife"; "Oliver, the spy's evidence." It is however much better to say, "The wife of John, the old farmer," "The evidence of Oliver, the spy."

In the case of many compound words the hyphen really represents the sign of the possessive case; thus, dog-collar, horse-blanket, stand for dog's collar, horse's blanket. This is an advantage peculiar to our language. It enables us to say much in few words, which always gives strength to language, and after clearness, strength is the most valuable quality that writing or speech can possess.

The possessive is properly used in the construction of sentences like the following: "He grieved at the nation's being unprepared," "Her being fully dressed was fortunate," "the cause of your brother's going to sea," etc. The omission of the apostrophe and s or of the possessive pronoun in such cases would be plain error.

The use of the double possessive, as in "that house of Smith's," "a portrait of Peter's," etc., though frequently the subject of controversy, has the sanction of the majority of writers and is well established. It has the merit of preventing ambiguity. "A portrait of Peter" may be one of two things—a likeness of Peter or a portrait merely owned by Peter. "A portrait of Peter's" plainly indicates Peter's possession of the portrait of somebody else.

posted. Colloquially used for "informed," but without reason. It is sadly overworked in such cases as "He is well posted," which is a commercial colloquialism.

practical. Misused for skilful. What does "a practical printer" mean? Is not every printer practical?

predicate. Often misused by speakers and writers who do not seem to understand the meaning of the word and fall into the habit of misapplying it. Its use in the sense of predict or foretell is always wrong.

preferable. Accented on the first syllable, pref'er-a-bl; not pre-fer'a-bl.

prepositions. The use of a preposition at the end of a sentence, as in "What are you thinking of?" is often objected to, but is sanctioned by abundant authority.

pretty. Pronounced prit'i, not pret'i.

preventive. Often mispronounced preventative. The use of "preventative," according to White, ought to be regarded as evidence of an utter want of education and of a low grade of intelligence.

previous. Often misused for previously, though the locution "previous to" is used by some good writers. The simpler "before" may often be substituted with advantage.

pristine. Properly pronounced pris'tin, not pris'tine (long i), nor pris'teen.

probably. Mispronounced prob'li; should be three syllables, prob'a-bli.

procure. Often used by persons who disdain or who have forgotten the simple word "get."

program. This word is mispronounced when the final syllable is clipped to -grm, instead of being sounded with the short a, -gram. The spelling indicated is now preferred to the original French form programme.

promise. Sometimes improperly used for "assure"; thus, "I will avenge myself, I promise you," should be "I assure you."

proof, evidence, testimony. The distinctions between these words should be carefully observed. Proof is that which simply proves; evidence is that which makes evident or clear; testimony is a species of evidence by means of witnesses. Evidence may be words or deeds, writing or discourse; testimony is properly evidence by words spoken, and more strictly speaking, the person giving the evidence. Proof is the act of proving, as well as the thing that proves.

propose. We should not "propose to take a vacation," but we may "purpose" doing so. "Propose" is often incorrectly used in this manner. Correctly used, it means to offer, or put forward, to be considered by others. To purpose is to intend, design, or resolve. We purpose in our own mind, and propose to others.

Crabb makes the following distinction: "We purpose (design) that which is at hand, or immediately to be set about; we propose that which is more distant; the former requires the setting before one's mind, the latter requires deliberation and plan. We purpose many things which we never think worth while doing; but we ought not to propose anything to ourselves which is not of too much importance to be lightly adopted or rejected. We purpose to go to town on a certain day; we propose to spend our time in a particular study."

proposition, proposal. These two words may be distinguished from each other thus: Proposal comes from propose, in the sense of offer; proposition comes from propose in the sense of setting down in a distinct form of words. We make a proposal to a person to enter into a partnership with him; we make a proposition to one who is at variance with us to settle the difference.

proven. An irregular form of the past participle "proved," used chiefly in courts of law, as in the Scotch verdict "not proven."

providing. Almost always incorrectly used for provided, even with good writers and speakers. We should not say "Providing it is a fine day," but "provided."

purchase. The best speakers and writers do not purchase, but instead they buy.

quaggy. Pronounced kwag'i, not kwog'i.

quality. The phrase "the quality," signifying those of superior station, is obsolete or used only by the ignorant. It was formerly in good use among all classes.

quantity. This word is often erroneously used for number. It should be used in speaking of that which may be measured; as, a quantity of lumber; but "number" is used of what is counted; as, a large number of birds.

quash. Pronounced kwosh, not kwash.

quit. Commonly used with the meaning to leave off, stop; we quit smoking, quit laughing, and quit our foolishness. In English usage, the only popular sense is that of leave, go away, as in "Quit the room!"

quite. Now loosely used in the sense of "rather" or "very," the original meaning being completely, entirely, fully. We say "quite warm," "quite ill," and even colloquially, "quite a number." In the last example the meaning is "a considerable number." "Quite a few," being translated, also means a considerable number.

quite so. An unsanctioned colloquialism for "yes, indeed."

quite some. A common and unsanctioned colloquialism.

quorum. Mispronounced kwor'um; should be kwo'rum.

quotient. The first syllable is kwo'-, not ko'-; pronounced kwo'shent.

R. This letter is never silent, though it frequently loses its consonant sound with some speakers and in some localities almost disappears from speech, especially in such words as large, dear, bear, door, their, etc., where it is scarcely heard as a separate sound, having merely the effect of lengthening the preceding vowel, the words becoming lahj, deah, etc. Such pronunciation is of course to be avoided if possible. It is ingrained in the speech of many, but attempts should be made to correct it.

The letter "r" has a peculiar influence on both the long and the short sound of the vowels, says Alfred Ayres in The Orthoëpist. "Sometimes it changes the short sound of a, as in man, into its Italian sound, as in far, and the short sound of o, as in not, into its broad sound, as in nor. It has a corresponding effect on the short sound of the other vowels. When "r" is preceded by a short vowel it sometimes has the effect of blending the syllables. Thus the dissyllables higher, lower, mower, rower, sower, and flower, are pronounced precisely like the monosyllables hire, lore, more, roar, soar, and flour."

radiator. Pronounce this word with long a's, the same as radiate and radio.

radish. Often mispronounced red'ish; should be rad'ish.

raise. Misused for "rise," in sentences like "He was too tired to raise, or to raise up." "He could not raise himself up, or raise up his head," is correct. Raise is always transitive and hence requires an object. It is not sufficient to have that object implied or understood. It must be expressed, or else the intransitive "rise" must be used.

We "raise" animals, but do not "raise children." The latter are properly "reared."

rarely. Sometimes misused for the adjective rare. "It is very rarely that such a thing happens" is an example of the use of the word that is objected to by some writers, but has the sanction of many others.

rather. Pronounced rath'er, not ruth'er. Sometimes wrongly used with adjectives in -ish which imply "somewhat"; thus, warmish means rather or somewhat warm, and "rather warmish" is a pleonasm.

ration. Pronounced ra'shun or rash'un.

rational. Pronounced rash'un-al.

"It is very common in the United States to pronounce rational and national with the first syllable long—ra'tional, na'tional, but this mode is not countenanced by any of the English orthoēpists."—Worcester.

raw. Do not mispronounce this word. Rawr is indeed raw.

real estate. Objected to by some purists when used in everyday speech of property in land and buildings, but too firmly established to be affected by protest. Members of a national association of real estate men now call themselves realtors.

recipe. Nobody appears to know why this word is used for the word receipt, and it should not be.

recognize. Pronounced rek'og-nize, not re-kog'nize, not rek'un-ize.

redemption. The p must be sounded, re-demp'shun.

relative. Preferred to "relation," in speaking of one's kindred.

rendition. Often misused for performance or rendering. Rendition means primarily a yielding, surrender. It is permissible when used in the sense of artistic interpretation, that is, translation of the author's meaning, but not for mere performance; as, the rendition of a piccolo solo.

reside. If we were to "live" more and "reside" less, life would be more pleasant for our neighbors. Ayres says of "reside": "A big word that Mr. Wouldbe uses where Mr. Is uses the little word 'live.'" residence. Often merely a stilted synonym for house. Properly used in the following: He lays claim to residence in the First ward; the stately residences of Fifth avenue; mere residence does not make a citizen.

respirator. Pronounced res'pi-ra-tor, not re-spi'ra-tor.

restive. The original sense was obstinate, unwilling to go forward, very different from that of "restless," with which "restive" is now frequently interchanged. Those who stickle for the retention of the original meaning, however, are in a hopeless minority, and "a restive horse" in modern literature, at least, is always a restless or fidgety horse.

resurrect. This word has crept into use in the sense of disinter, but the purists continue to shy at it.

retire. It is only the overnice that use "retire" in the sense of "go to bed."—Ayres.

reverse. To be distinguished from converse.

revolt. Used as a transitive verb, in the sense "to shock," with the sanction of good authority. "The horrid sight revolted me."

rhythm. Properly pronounced rithm, in one syllable, with the th soft as in "thing" or hard as in "this"; not rith'um.

right. Often misused, as "The bosses have as good a right to be arrested as the strikers." Of one who used "right" in this manner Richard Grant White wrote: "He could not have spoken worse English if he were a cockney; and from some cockney he must have caught this trick, which, common enough for a long while among British speakers, and even writers of a low order, has been heard here only within a few years." A right is something which we strive to get and to keep. But we do not speak, at least in America, of a murderer's right to be hanged, and should not speak of a "right" to be arrested.

rights. The distinction between rights and privileges is not always observed. Strictly, a right signifies what is right for one to possess; a privilege is a species of right peculiar to particular individuals, or bodies. Privileges are rights granted to individuals, and usually depend upon the will of the grantor.

rind. Pronounced with a long i and the full d sound, rynd; not rind, nor rine.

risk, risky. Mispronounced resk, resk'i; should be risk, risk'i.

robust. Accented on the final syllable, ro-bust'; not ro'bust.

role. Though this word has been pretty well Anglicized, it is not always substituted with advantage for the other word, part.

romance. Mispronounced ro'mance; should be ro-mance'. The stress is on the last syllable.

rub. The best speakers and writers do not use this word in such a connection as "He gave me a bad rub"—not when they mean an unjust criticism.

s. Particular attention should be given to this letter in the pronunciation of such terminals as -sion, -sian, and -sure. Also learn where to place the apostrophe in connection with this letter.

sacrilegious. Almost always mispronounced sak-ril-ij'us; should be sak-ril-e'jus.

sagacious. Pronounced sa-ga'shus, not sa-gash'us.

said, says. Often mispronounced sade, saze; should be sed, sez.

same. Often misused for similar. We do not have the same dinner today that we had yesterday, but a similar dinner.

sandwich. The d sound is sometimes carelessly omitted, but is required for correct pronunciation.

sanguine. The first n becomes ng in pronunciation, sang'gwin, not san'gwin.

sarsaparilla. Commonly mispronounced sas-pa-ril'a, sas-a-pa-ril'a, sars-pa-rel'a, and even sas-pa-rel'a. The word is pronounced as it is spelled, sar-sa-pa-ril'a, and colloquial shortening or corruption is inexcusable.

saucy. Should not be corrupted to "sassy," or, worse yet, "sass."

saw, seen. Careless speakers who know better are frequently guilty of such solecisms as "I seen him, we seen him," for "I, or we, saw him," and by the ignorant such errors are a constant offense.

say! The use of this exclamation is too frequent. It is a vulgar method of attracting attention or of introducing a remark.

says I. Inelegant at all times and not used by good speakers; overworked by the ignorant.

scallop. The irregular pronunciation skol'up is correct; not skal'up.

scarcely, hardly. According to Crabb: "In many cases these words may be used indifferently; but where the idea of practicability predominates, scarcely seems preferable. One can hardly judge of a person's features by a single and partial glance; we scarcely ever see men lay aside their vices from a thorough conviction of their enormity: but it may with equal propriety be said in general sentences, hardly one in a thousand, or scarcely one in a thousand, would form such a conclusion," scared. Should not be mispronounced skaert.

scholar. Look up and compare this word with the words pupil and student, and then use them correctly.

score. Words of this character, including head, brace, dozen, gross, denoting a quantity, a measure, etc., are generally used in the singular after a numerical adjective. Thus, we say, three score years and ten; five brace of partridges; two dozen eggs; twelve gross of matches; fifty head of steers. Regarding the word pair, however, the best writers and speakers use the plural form, three pairs of shoes.

scythe. Pronounced with the "th" hard as in writhe.

sects. Often mispronounced seks; should be sekts.

seldom or ever. This phrase is a common solecism. It should be "seldom if ever" or "seldom or never."

sensation, sensational. Everything that is noteworthy is not sensational, but the unhappy tendency of some people is to create a sensation, or endeavor to create one, over very ordinary occurrences.

News is not always sensational when it is treated sensationally, and, fortunately for the public, most of the news that is treated sensationally fails to create the sensation that is intended.

set, sit. Set is often colloquially misused for sit, the two words being popularly confused in the same way as lie and lay, fly and flee.

A hen properly sits on eggs, not sets; we set the hen which sits; we set a vase on the mantel, not sit. Sit is almost always an intransitive verb, which must be remembered in order to avoid error in its use. We sit up in bed, not set up. We sit for a photograph, not set for it. A court sits not sets; we set down figures, but sit down to write.

"The needs of language," says a noted writer, "guided by instinct, we know not exactly how, effected the distinction between these pairs of words, and it has been confirmed by the usage of many centuries. There is a real difference between the two words, and the distinction is valid and useful."

sewage. This word and sewerage are properly distinguished in meaning, though sometimes used interchangeably. Sewage is the refuse matter, and sewerage the process of removing it by sewers, or the system of sewers used.

shall, will. The distinction between these two auxiliaries, in the usage of the best speakers and writers, is very marked, though it has been called "a verbal quibble" by a few English scholars of eminence.

Shall is used in many other senses than as a mere sign of futurity and will is more than a mere expression of willingness, purpose or authority.

"Why should we suffer a smart little verbal shock when the Irish servant says, 'Will I put some more coal on the fire?' And why should we be so hardhearted as to laugh at the story of the Frenchman who, falling into the water, cried out as he was going down, 'I vill drown, and nobody shall help me?' But those who have genuine, well-trained English tongues and ears are shocked, and do laugh." With this introduction Richard Grant White in Words and their Uses has discussed the reasons for discriminating in use between shall and will. He infers, as do most writers on the subject, that discrimination is employed only by the gifted few who have a delicate instinct in the use of language.

Will is nearly always the word misused, not shall. A typical example is found in the common question, "Will I go with you?" for "Shall I go with you?"

shook. This word is an obsolete past participle of shake, but this fact does not excuse its present misuse for shaken. "Has she shook him?" is surely ungrammatical.

should, would. As with shall and will, so with should and would. They are frequently interchanged in error and care should be taken to acquire the power of making the nice discrimination required by correct diction. Would is generally misused for should, rarely should for would. Do not say, "I would like to go to Europe" but "I should like," etc. We say correctly, "I should like to go and would go if I could."

sideways. An undesirable variant of sidewise.

sight. Used colloquially for a very large amount or number; as, a sight of trouble; a sight of friends.

since. Often mispronounced sens. Since is often used for ago, but ago is never used for since. We say correctly, "not long ago," and "forty years since" should be "forty years ago." The proper use of since is illustrated in the following: "It is a year since it happened," "since I saw you," "since then," "since that time."

singing. "Nine persons out of ten say 'singin' instead of 'singing.' "—Dr. Peabody. The final "g" must be sounded in this and all such cases, but do not sound the first g hard, as sin'ging.

sleek. Mispronounced slik; should be sleke.

slough. Slough, a quagmire, a marshy place, is pronounced sloo; slough, to cast off skin, is pronounced sluf.

soften, Pronounced saw'fn; the t is silent.

sojourn. A good word when properly used in the sense of dwelling for a time, not considering the place as a permanent habitation; but misused as a synonym for stop or stay.

solecism. Pronounced sol'e-sizm, not so'le-sizm. An impropriety of speech arising from ignorance, or a gross deviation from the idiom of a language or from the rules of syntax.

solstice. Pronounced sol'stis, not sole'stis.

some, adv. Often misused for somewhat. "She is some better" should be "somewhat better." "I think some of going to Europe" and all such use of the word is provincial, not sanctioned.

sort of. This phrase has no more sanction than kind of, which see.

sown. Cloth is not sown but sewed or sewn; wheat is sown.

speak to. We properly speak on a question, or on a resolution, or on a bill, not to it. But we may speak "to the point" on a question.

speciality, specialty. Two distinct words, often confused; so often, indeed, that specialty is now generally substituted for speciality in all senses save that of "the quality of being special."

species. Pronounced spe'sheez. We speak of one species or of twenty species, the noun being singular or plural. It must not be confounded with specie, the collective noun which stands for coin as distinguished from paper money.

splendid. The word is misused and robbed of all its dignity in such colloquial use as "a splendid cup of tea," "a splendid little dog," "a splendid fit," "a perfectly splendid supper."

Alfred Ayres said: "This poor word is used by the gentler sex to qualify wellnigh everything that has their approval, from a sugar-plum to the national capitol. In fact, splendid and awful seem to be about the only adjectives some of our superlative young women have in their vocabularies."

stamp. Often mispronounced stomp, a bad habit of speech. The vowel sound is the short a of pat.

standpoint. A useful word, which, because of the irregular method of its formation, has often greatly excited the critics. It is well established and forms a valuable adjunct to "point of view" or "viewpoint."

state. Ordinarily, things are said, not stated. Some persons, however, say nothing, but state everything. They are the same persons who do not live anywhere, but "reside," and who "retire" when they go to bed.

steady. Pronounced sted'i, not stid'i.

sterile. Pronounced ster'il, not ster'yle.

stolid. Pronounced stol'id, not sto'lid.

stop. We stay, not stop, at a hotel. "Where are you staying?" is better than "Where are you stopping?"

strategist. Accented on the first syllable, strat'e-jist; not stra-te'jist.

stricken. The past participle "struck" is preferred, except when misfortune is implied, as "He was stricken with blindness." We also say, "The words were ordered stricken out," but "struck out" conforms to the best literary usage.

stupendous. Pronounced stu-pen'dus, not stu-pen'dious, or -jus.

stupid. Mispronounced stoo'pid; the u sound is long, stew'pid.

succeed himself. Can a man "succeed himself" in office? The propriety of the locution is questionable, but it is in common use and now passes without criticism. This would not legitimize the phrase, but there are signs of its recognition by the best writers.

such. "Such a large elephant" is improved by transposition to "so large an elephant." The change removes ambiguity.

such another. Properly, another such.

suggest. Many favor the pronunciation sug-jest′, with the first g hard as in jug, but this pronunciation is said by some critics to be difficult and to be lacking in euphony. A variant pronunciation, sud-jest′, is preferred by other writers, but the majority of present-day speakers say sug-jest′, which is thought to be the easiest and most pleasing pronunciation.

summons. Misused for summon, as, "He was summonsed into court." We properly summon and are summoned, but may receive a summons.

supple. Often mispronounced soop′l, without excuse; should be sup′l.

sure. Often misused for surely. "I will be there sure" should be "I will surely be there." Sure is never an adverb except to careless speakers.

syllables. Care should be taken to pronounce all the syllables of a word. It is a common fault of speech to shorten or clip final syllables, as in curtain (mispronounced curt′n), and especially is the final g dropped from such words as going, making, seeing, etc., which should be avoided.

sympathize, sympathy. We sympathize with a man, and have sympathy for him or with his aims in life. The preposition used with sympathy is governed by the sense.

take. In offering hospitality at the table, "What will you have?" is preferred to "What will you take?"

take on. A colloquialism for lament, grieve, or scold, consistently misused with "something" and "awful," in such remarks as "She took on something awful."

take up. In some parts of the United States a colloquialism for begin, used with school; thus, school takes up at two o'clock; we take up school in the fall. The locution must be condemned.

talented. This word was strenuously objected to during the period of its evolution but has become firmly fixed in the language. It expresses a shade of meaning not included in either "a clever man" or "a man of genius," but it is sometimes overworked and the word "gifted" may be used as a synonym.

tapestry. Not tape′es-tri, but tap′-es-tri.

tarantula. Accented on the second syllable, ta-ran′tu-la, not tar-an-tu′la.

tarpaulin. Pronounced tar-paw′lin, not tar-po′lin.

taxi. This is another word similar to the word cab, which see. It would appear to be all right to adopt it for want of another term.

techy. An old English word used by Shakespeare and former writers. It is no longer used by good speakers, being now corrupted to "touchy," from the notion of being sensitive to the touch. This is a mere adaptation, not an original expression.

tedious. Mispronounced te′jus; should be te′di-us.

tell on. A colloquialism meaning to give information in a mean way; as, "He tells on me every time he gets a chance." Largely used by children and should be corrected.

tenacious. pronounced te-na′shus; not te-nash′us.

tenses. Many errors in speaking and writing result from carelessness in the use of the tenses. To express clearly the time that is intended, the proper tense must be employed. There is perhaps no rule more frequently violated than this, even by good writers; and young writers are very prone to the error. Thus, the author of the Waverley novels has the following sentence:

" 'Description,' he said, 'was (is) to the author of a romance exactly what drawing and tinting were (are) to a painter; words were (are) his colors, and, if properly employed, they could (can) not fail to place the scene which he wished (wishes) to conjure up as effectually before the mind's eye as the tablet or canvas presents it to the bodily organ. The same rules,' he continued, 'applied (apply) to both, and an exuberance of dialogue in the former case was (is) a verbose and laborious mode of composition, which went (goes) to confound the proper art of the drama, a widely different species of composition, of which dialogue was (is) the very essence; because all, excepting the language to be made use of, was (is) presented to the eye by the dresses, and persons, and actions of the performers upon the stage.' "

The author was misled throughout in the uses of the verbs in this extract by the tense of the verb "said," with which he introduces it.

"I should like very much to have seen him." Sydney Smith would have improved his diction if he had written, "I should have liked to see him."

"I seen it" for "I saw it," and "I done it" for "I did it" are among the commonest of errors. "Went" for "gone," "come" for "came," "began" for "begun," "drank" for "drunk," etc., are only a few of the verbs that are frequently and inexcusably misused.

Extreme care must be taken in the use of verbs in sentences dependent upon an antecedent verb like say or said. The illustration from Scott, in the foregoing, shows how easy it is for even the experienced writer to abuse the tenses in stating what has been said. The general rule is that the time of the verb in the dependent sentence agrees with that of the antecedent. Thus, He said that we might go; he says that we may go; she said she was ready; he says he is ready.

In the use of irregular verbs, a proper distinction should be made in the use of the imperfect tense and the perfect participle. The following sentences are examples of the neglect of such distinction:

He done (did) it at my request; he run (ran) a great risk; he has mistook (mistaken) his true interest; the cloth was wove (woven) of the finest wool; he writes as the best authors would have wrote (written) had they writ (written) upon the subject; the bell has been rang (rung); I have spoke (spoken) to him upon the subject.

tepid. Pronounced tep'id, not te'pid.

Terpsichorean. Pronounced terp-sik-o-re'an, not terp-si-ko're-an.

terrapin. Pronounced ter'ra-pin, with the e-sound short as in met; not tur'a-pin.

terrible. In this section see the word awful and be governed accordingly.

than, conj. Used after certain adjectives and adverbs that express comparison or diversity, such as more, better, other, otherwise, rather, else, for the purpose of introducing the second member of the comparison. When there is no comparison, "than" should not be used. It is frequently misused for "when" after hardly, scarcely, etc. "Scarcely had he gone out than (when) the storm broke."

"Different . . . than" is often found in sentences which should read "different from"; thus, "Boys seem to have different tastes than girls."

than whom. Objected to by some writers when whom is not really in the objective case. Instead of "than whom" some other form should be used. "Nero, than whom no crueller man ever lived, was," etc. Here we can say, "Nero—and no crueller man has ever lived—was," etc.; or, "No crueller man than Nero has ever lived. He was," etc.

When the relative is in the objective case, whom is indisputably correct after than; thus, "My brother, than whom I love no one more dearly, is ill."

Those who favor the unlimited use of "than whom" contend that "than" is a preposition, and hence properly governs the objective case in whom.

that, who, which. As a relative pronoun that is frequently used as equivalent to who or which. That always introduces an adjective clause, while who and which are not always so used. That is restrictive in its effect.

After indefinite pronouns or indefinite pronominal adjectives (others, several, many, some, none, one, etc.), who or which is to be preferred to that.

After personal pronouns prefer who or which: "He who is wise."

After the conjunction that, prefer who or which: "He said that the man who saw him."

It is not improper to follow the demonstrative "this" by the relative that: "It was this that caused his death."

When who or which is used restrictively for that, it is well to place "the" or "that" before the antecedent: "The States which border on Canada."

that. Often erroneously repeated in constructing a sentence; thus, "I have told her that when you come next week to see her, that you will stay." The second that is superfluous.

theater. This spelling has been adopted by many leading publications and should be used by all. This word is mispronounced the-ay'ter. The accent is on the first syllable, the'a-ter.

thee, thou, thy, thine. Many speakers and writers find difficulty in the proper use of this form of the second person. Bible students, however, have little or no such difficulty.

"Thee" is used by many members of the Society of Friends as an irregular nominative: "Thee looks healthy." But this may be regarded as a colloquialism, the regular nominative "thou" being the formal style of address.

then. Sometimes used elliptically for

"then existing"; thus, "his then situation," "the then administration." It is not a locution to be sanctioned, though many eminent writers have used it.

these kind. Kind and sort are singular nouns and take the singular pronouns this, that, and not the plural these, those. It is as incorrect and displays ignorance to say "I do not like these kind of hats" as it would be to say "I do not like these style of hats."

they, their. Erroneously used when the reference is to a single person or object. "Some one has lost their hat," should be his, or her, hat. "If anybody has a grievance, let them keep it to themselves." The pronouns should be singular, to agree with "anybody."

think for. In sentences like "More than you think for," the for is always superfluous.

thousand. Not thow'zan, but thow'zand.

through. "I am through," for "I have finished," is a colloquialism sometimes extended to mean "I have finished my meal."

tiny. Pronounced ti'ni; not tee'ni.

to. As the sign of the infinitive, to is sometimes used for the infinitive itself. "I do not want to go if I do not have to," that is, if I do not have to go. This use is contrary to grammatical rule.

Many writers make a special bugbear of the "split infinitive," that is, the separation in construction of the infinitive sign "to" from its verb, as by an adverb. Avoidance of such separation is correct as a general rule, but English literature contains many examples of split infinitives, used by the best writers, and exceptions to the prohibitory rule can sometimes be made with profit. It must ever be borne in mind that the English language rebels against hard-and-fast rules.

The strict enforcement of the rule against "split" infinitives often results in stilted or pedantic diction. The insertion of an adverb between the infinitive and its sign sometimes removes ambiguity and improves the construction. In such cases it is permissible. A wise discretion should govern.

today, tonight, tomorrow. These appear to be real words without the hyphen, to-day, to-night, to-morrow. Being given as much use as necessity demands, in the name of economy, if for no better reason, omit the hyphen.

transmigrate. Accented on the first syllable, trans'mi-grate, not trans-mi'grate.

transpire. Often misused, especially as a mistaken synonym for occur, happen, or elapse. "Its common abuse," said Richard Grant White, "is due solely to the blunder of persons who used it although they were ignorant of its meaning, at which they guessed."

The original meaning of transpire is to pass off or to emit through the pores of the skin; but in this sense we now use perspire. The present meaning of transpire is to escape from secrecy, to leak out, to become public; as, "The proceedings of the senate have not yet transpired." But people erroneously say, "Years will transpire (elapse) before he returns"; "you talk as if it transpired (occurred) yesterday."

John Stuart Mill said: "The verb transpire formerly conveyed very expressively its correct meaning, viz., to become known through unnoticed channels; to exhale, as it were, into publicity through invisible pores, like a vapor or gas disengaging itself. But of late (1874) a practice has commenced of employing this word . . . as a mere synonym of to happen.

traveler. Pronounced in three syllables, trav'el-er, not trav'ler.

tremendous. Not tre-men'jus, but tre-men'dus.

trodden, trod. The first form of the participle is generally preferred in prose.

truism. Often misused for truth. That rents are high in a certain neighborhood is not a truism, but a truth, that is, a truthful assertion. A truism is a self-evident truth.

try. Misused for make in "to try experiments." The word experiment includes the sense of "try."

tryst, trysting. Pronounced trist, trist'ing, with the i short as in whist.

tulip. The first syllable is tiu' (long u), not too'.

turbine. Pronounced tur'bin, not tur'bine or tur'been.

turnip. Not tur'nup, but tur'nip.

tyranny. Pronounced tir'an-ni, the first vowel sound being that of i in fit; not tire'an-ni. Tyrannical is accented on the second syllable, ty-ran'nik-al.

U

u. This letter is no longer the same as the letter v, and the two forms are not interchangeable, as they were formerly; so the art printer and the artistic sign writer who makes it "The Kvbvn Bvilding" for "The Kubun Building," should be compelled to correct their errors without charging for the labor or material.

ugly. Used in the sense of ill-tempered, vicious, or dangerous. Some writers say the usual meaning is ill-favored, though it is not restricted to that sense. The common English use is seen in "An ugly duckling." Americans say, "He has an ugly disposition as well as an ugly face;

the child was whipped because it was ugly."

umbrella. Not um-ber-el'ɐ, but um-brel'la.

un-. This prefix expresses negation, and care should be taken lest a double negative creep into the construction of sentences in which it occurs, as in the following example: He spoke in no unmistakable tones. Here the no makes an erroneous double negative. He spoke in unmistakable tones.

uncommon. Misused for the adverb uncommonly; as, butter is uncommon cheap.

uncouth. Accented on the last syllable, which is pronounced -kooth, the th being soft as in youth.

underhanded. Some writers refuse to recognize this word, preferring underhand, but it is in common use.

understand about. "Do you understand about that?" is a faulty sentence, understand being often misused for know in such cases.

unique. Often misused in the sense of beautiful, and also when compared. Unique means sole, unmatched, hence a thing cannot properly be described as "very unique."

United States. We say correctly, "The United States is," not "are," when we speak of this country as a nation. "United States" has been firmly established as a singular nominative.

unlearned. The adjective is pronounced un-ler'ned; the participle un-lerned'.

unprecedented. Pronounced un-pres'e-dent-ed, not un-pre'se-.

up. Elliptically used to signify set up, raise, erect; as, Up with you! Up with the flag! In ignorant speech, a past or other tense is sometimes omitted; as, He up and laughed; or it is unpardonably inflected like a verb; as, He ups and says.

upon. Often unnecessarily used for on. We call on persons, converse on topics of common interest, and wait on tables.

usage. Pronounced yu'zaje. Sometimes misused for use. Usage is custom, use is the act or manner of using, or the state of being used. Usage is what one has been long used to do; use refers us to the employment of things generally. A word is in good use when sanctioned by the habitual usage of a sufficient number.

used. Pronounced yuzd, not yust. We say correctly "We used to live there," not "we use to live there."

utter. v. Often misused for say, express. To utter is to put out, that is, to send forth a sound. A dumb man has utterance, but not speech. We utter a groan; say what we think; express a sentiment; and speak our mind.

utter, utterly. The word utter is merely outer in another form. Utter darkness is the darkness of a place entirely outside of the realm of light, and utter nonsense is nonsense entirely outside of the pale of reason. But the word utter does not mean perfect, absolute, and complete, save in the sense of being outer. We speak correctly of an utter stranger, but not of an utter friend. Utter can only be used in an unfavorable sense.

Similarly, the adverb utterly can only be used for absolutely when the sense is unfavorable; thus, we may say utterly debased, but not "utterly delightful."

v. This letter is never silent, but in some sections of the country it is pronounced like w, as wase, for vase, wery for very, etc.

vagary. Accented on the second syllable, va-ga'ri; not va'ga-ri.

valuable. Pronounced in four syllables, val'u-a-bl; not val'u-bl. Sometimes misused for valued. A valuable contributor, a valuable friend, should be a valued contributor, a valued friend.

vamose. Not in good use, though of legitimate Spanish origin. It is always regarded as slang.

vase. The preferred pronunciation is vais, although vaze, vahz, and vawz are used by those who try to copy French and English pronunciations.

vaudeville. Pronounced vode'vil.

vehement. Accented on the first syllable, ve'he-ment; not ve-he'ment.

venal, venial. Often confounded though very different in meaning. Venial is excusable, pardonable, hence trifling. Venal is purchasable, mercenary, hence unprincipled. A venal man gives up all principle for interest; garrulity is a venial offense in old age.

ventilate. Used in the sense of bringing into discussion, this word may be applied to such matters as questions of policy, grievances, etc., but not directly to persons. Such use is often regarded as a neologism, but it was not unknown four hundred years ago. Froude quotes a state paper of that period in which the following passage occurs: "Nor shall it ever be seen that the king's cause shall be ventilated or decided in any place out of his own realm."

veracity. Properly applied only to persons, while truth is applicable to facts as well as to persons. It is pleonastic to speak of "a man of truth and veracity," veracity having the same significance as truth and being entirely superfluous.

verbal. Sometimes used in the sense of oral, that is, spoken, uttered, as when we speak of a verbal contract, or of sending a verbal message. This use of the word is well authorized.

verbosity. Pronounced ver-bos'i-ti, not ver-bose'i-ti.

verse. In modern use, this word has several meanings besides its original one, which was a line of poetry. It is commonly used for stanza, and indeed for a short division of any metrical composition, as well as for the shortest division of the Scriptures; also for poetry in general or poetical measures, as distinguished from prose. We say, He wrote in verse as well as in prose.

very. A writer in the Cincinnati Commercial once discussed the common use of the adverb "very" as follows:

"This little word is often used in the English language when a sentence would be much stronger and the meaning much more forcible without it. If a man has not much hair on the top of his head, it is not enough for people to say simply that he is bald: he is very bald. A man is not stingy: he is very stingy—when the one good strong word stingy would put the whole point forcibly. . . . The qualifier has become so common that it is weakening to the word it is joined to. In nine cases out of ten where 'very' is used to intensify human speech, a single bold word without the 'very' would hit the meaning like a hammer, and drive it home with a directness unknown to clogged and hampered expression.

"Very seems to be a word designed by Providence for young ladies to express their feelings with. . . . It creeps into our literature as insidiously as the measles into a family of fifteen, and once there, it stays like an office-seeker."

veterinary. Pronounced in five syllables, vet'er-i-na-ri; not vet'rin-a-ri.

victory. Pronounced vik'to-ri, not vik'-tri.

victuals. Pronounced vit'tlz. Walker wrote of this word:

"This corruption, like most others, has terminated in the generation of a new word; for no solemnity will allow of pronouncing this word as it is written. 'Victuals' appeared to Swift so contrary to the real sound that in some of his manuscript remarks he spells the word vittles."

viewpoint. Properly used as one word instead of the three words, point of view.

violoncello. Sometimes corrupted to "violincello," which would mean a little violin, while a violoncello is four or five times larger than a violin. Violoncello is from violone, an obsolete stringed instrument that was large and very different from the violin or violino.

virulent. Not ver'u-lent, but vir'u-lent. The first vowel sound is that of i in vim.

vitriol. Not vit'rul, but vit'ri-ol.

volcano. Pronounced vol-ka'no, not vol-kah'no.

voluntarily. Properly accented on the first syllable, vol'un-ta-ri-li; not vol-un-ta'ri-li.

vulgar. Often misused for indecent. Its true sense is common, ordinary, plebian, hence coarse, unrefined. An act or expression of low manners is a vulgarity.

waft. The vowel sound is that of a in ask, pass, etc., not the short a of pat.

wandering. Pronounced in three syllables, won'der-ing; not won'dring.

was, were. For errors in the use of these verbs, see remarks and examples under case and plurals.

wa'n't. A vulgar contraction of was not, or were not. "They wa'n't at home," ways. Misused for way. "A long ways off" is properly "a long way off."

we. Often misused in the country press, by lack of distinction from "the editorial we." "We do not think State Senator Smith rightly understands his duty, as we remarked to him when we and our wife met him at the church social a week ago last Tuesday." Here the first "we" is editorial and legitimately used. The second and the third "we" and the expression "our wife," are distinctly personal, and the sentence should have been constructed in a different manner, to avoid the confusion which makes it ridiculous.

Wednesday. Pronounced in two syllables only, wens'day.

went, gone. A very common colloquial error is the use of went for gone in such sentences as "They have went astray"; "he has went away without a word." It always displays the ignorance of the user.

wh-. In words beginning with wh-, as whale, whack, what, etc., the distinctive sound of w is preceded by the aspirate sound of h, as if h were the initial and followed by w. The omission of the aspirate in such cases is a common error. Be careful in mispronouncing such words, as wen for when, wat for what, wich for which, wite for white, etc.

where. No preposition is required with where, at the end of an interrogative sentence, or of an assertion. At and to are superfluous in questions like "Where am I at?" "Where are you going to?" and also in sentences like "He did not know where he was at, or where he was bound to?"

whereabouts. The form whereabout is preferred by the best speakers. The modern tendency is to drop the s in all such words.

whether or no. In all cases "whether or not" is more correct, though "whether or no" has gained some recognition in literary use.

who, whom. Frequently the cause of error. "Who did you speak to?" "who will you vote for?" "who are you looking at?" The pronoun in all these should be whom, as will be readily seen if the sentence be transposed.

On the other hand, whom is misused for who in cases like the following: "The man whom they said was dead," "the two persons whom they agreed were the best looking." In both cases the nominative "who" is correct.

whole of. Misused for entire and for all. "The whole of the students" should be "all the students"; "the whole of the congregation" should be "the entire congregation."

whose. Correctly used as the possessive of "which," as well as of "who." Thus "Philosophy, whose end is to instruct us in the knowledge of nature," instead of "Philosphy, the end of which," etc.

Concerning this Dr. Campbell says: "Some grammarians remonstrate; but it ought to be remembered that use, well-established, must give law to grammar, and not grammar to use."

widow woman. A widow is always a woman, hence "widow woman" is pleonastic. Omit "woman."

wind. Pronounced wind, with the vowel short, as in wit; not wynd, except in poetry for the sake of rime, etc.

without. Often used improperly for unless.

"I shall not go without my mother consents," should be "unless my mother consents," or "without my mother's consent."

"You cannot be a good citizen without you exercise your franchise," should be "unless you exercise."

witness. Used by many persons as a "big synonym" of see, with absurd effect. "The most splendid bay I ever witnessed." The speaker meant the most splendid bay he ever "saw." A man witnesses a murder, an assault, a theft, or any act at the performance of which he was present and observing. But we cannot witness a thing—we see it.

worse. Vulgarly misused for more. "He hated cant worse (more) than gossip."

worst kind. In such phrases as "I want to go the worst kind of way," the words "the worst kind of way," are substituted for "very much," but only by those ignorant of English.

wove. Not to be used for the past participle of weave. Say, "This cloth is woven," not wove.

wrestle. Often mispronounced ras'sl; should be res'sl.

y-. In old English terms like yclept, pronounced like short i, as in bit. The meaning of the word is the same if y be eliminated.

yacht. Pronounced yot, not yat.

yap. This is a commonly used slang word, not pleasing to the ear or pen.

yellow. Pronounced yel'o, not yell'a.

yolk. Pronounced yoke.

yonder. Not yen'der, nor yun'der, but yon'der.

you. Whether used for one person or for more, the pronoun you always requires a verb in the plural. "You was" is never correct, and it is one of the most common errors in English speech. Offenders are strangely plentiful among people of education who should know better. "You was" for "you were" is not excusable as a colloquialism.

you and I. These two pronouns are joined with propriety only when they are both in the nominative. Many persons regard them as inseparable companions. They are to be used together only when they can be rightly used. Thus, it is correct to say, "You and I are going to church," "You and I look alike"; but it is not correct to say "Between you and I," "Let you and I play mah-jong." In the last two examples the pronouns are governed by "between" and "play"; that is, they are in the objective case and should be "you and me." We would not say "Between I and you," neither would we say "Let I and you play."

"He is not as young as you and I." Here "you and I" are correctly used, because they are in the nominative case, the verb "are" being understood—"as young as you and I are." But "She saw them before she saw you and I," is erroneous, for "saw" governs the objective and "before she saw you and me" is the form required.

youths. Pronounced youths, not youthz.

zealot. Pronounced zel'ot, not ze'lot.

zeugma. This figure of speech is the referring of a word to two different ones which, in strict syntax, can agree with only one of them; as when two nouns are joined to a verb suitable to only one of them, but suggesting another verb suitable to the other noun; or when an adjective is similarly used with two nouns. Zeugma was common in Greek, but is avoided in English. An example is seen in Pope's line, "In him who is, or him who finds, a friend."

zoological, zoology. Pronounced zo-o-loj'ik-al, zo-ol'o-ji. The first syllable is often mispronounced zoo-.

zouave. Pronounced as two syllables, zoo-ahv not zwahv.

BIRTH DAYS

Monday's child is fair of face;
Tuesday's child is full of grace;
Wednesday's child is loving and giving;
Thursday's child works hard for its living;
Friday's child is full of woe;
Saturday's child has far to go;
But the child that's born on the Sabbath day
Is blithe and bonny and good and gay.

EVERYONE HIS OWN WEATHER PROPHET

Almanac predictions can be nothing but conjecture, the earth's subjection to many unknowable and undeterminable forces rendering such calculations impossible. It is practicable, however, by the following rules, drawn from actual results during very many years and applied with due regard to the subjects of solar and lunar attraction with reference to this planet, to foresee the kind of weather most likely to follow the moon's change of phase.

PROGNOSTICATIONS

If New Moon, First Quarter, Full Moon or Last Quarter happens	In Summer	In Winter
Between midnight and 2 A.M.	Fair..... (1 and 2)	Frost, unless wind is S. W. (7)
" 2 " 4 "	Cold and showers.....	Snow and stormy
" 4 " 6 "	Rain.....	Rain
" 6 " 8 "	Wind and rain.....	Stormy
" 8 " 10 "	Changeable.....	Cold rain if wind W., snow if E.
" 10 " 12 "	Frequent showers ..... (3)	Cold and high wind
" 12 " 2 "	Very rainy..... (4)	Snow or rain.
" 2 " 4 "	Changeable.....	Fair and mild.
" 4 " 6 "	Fair.....	Fair.
" 6 " 8 "	Fair if wind N.W.....	Fair and frosty if wind N. or N.E.
" 8 " 10 "	Rainy if S., or S. W.....	Rain or snow if S. or S. W.
" 10 " midnight	Fair.....	Fair and frosty.

Observations.—1. The nearer the moon's change, first quarter, full and last quarter to midnight, the fairer will be the weather during the next seven days.

2. The space for this calculation occupies from ten at night till two next morning.

3. The nearer to midday or noon the phase of the moon happens, the more foul or wet weather may be expected during the next seven days.

4. The space for this calculation occupies from ten in the forenoon to two in the afternoon. These observations refer principally to summer, though they affect spring and autumn in the same ratio.

5. The moon's change, first quarter, full and last quarter happening during six of the afternoon hours, i.e., from four to ten, may be followed by fair weather, but this is mostly dependent on the wind, as is noted in the table.

6. Though the weather, from a variety of irregular causes, is more uncertain in the latter part of autumn, the whole of winter and the beginning of spring, yet, in the main, the above observations will apply to these periods also.

7. To prognosticate correctly, especially in those cases where the wind is concerned, the observer should be within sight of a vane where the four cardinal points of the compass are correctly placed.

LANGUAGE OF THE FLOWERS

A cluster of flowers can be made to express any sentiment if care is taken in the selection.

If a flower is offered reversed, its original signification is contradicted, and the opposite implied.

A rosebud divested of thorns, but retaining leaves, conveys the sentiment, "I fear no longer; I hope." Stripped of leaves and thorns, it signifies, "There is nothing to hope or fear."

A full-blown rose, placed over two buds, signifies "Secrecy."

"Yes" is implied by touching the flower given to the lips; "No," by pinching off a petal and casting it away.

"I am," is expressed by a laurel leaf twined around the bouquet; "I have," by an ivy leaf folded together; "I offer you," by a leaf of Virginia creeper.

FACTS ABOUT THE EARTH

According to Clark, the equatorial semi-diameter of the earth is 20,926,202 feet = 3,963.296 miles, and the polar semi-diameter is 20,854,895 feet = 3,950.738 miles. One degree of latitude at the pole = 69.407 miles. One degree of latitude at the equator = 68.704 miles.

POPULATION OF THE EARTH BY CONTINENTS

(From estimates by the National Geographical Society)

Continental Divisions	Area in Sq. Miles	Inhabitants
		Number	Per Sq. Mile
Africa	11,513,579	180,000,000	16
America, North	8,037,714	130,000,000	17
America, South	6,851,306	35,000,000	5.2
Asia	17,057,666	900,000,000	52.76
Australasia	3,456,290	8,000,000	2.31
Europe	3,754,282	450,000,000	121
Polar Region	6,970,268	300,000	0.05
Total	57,641,102	1,732,000,000	30

Ravenstein's estimate of the earth's fertile region, in square miles, is 28,269,200; steppe, 13,901,000; desert, 4,180,000; polar regions, 4,888,800.

The population of the earth at the death of the Emperor Augustus, estimated by Bodio, was 54,000,000. The population of Europe hardly exceeded 50,000,000 before the fifteenth century.—Mulhall.

The area and cubic contents of the earth, according to the data of Clark, given above, are: Surface, 196,971,984 square miles; cubic contents, 259,944,035,515 cubic miles.

Murray-Challenger expedition states the greatest depth of the Atlantic Ocean at 27,366 feet; Pacific Ocean, 30,000 feet; Indian Ocean, 18,582 feet; Southern Ocean, 25,200 feet; Arctic Ocean, 9,000 feet. The greatest depth of the Pacific Ocean yet found was obtained by the U. S. collier "Nero" on November 14, 1899, when soundings near the island of Guam showed 31,614 feet. The Atlantic Ocean has an area, in square miles, of 24,536,000; Pacific Ocean, 50,309,000; Indian Ocean, 17,084,000; Arctic Ocean, 4,781,000; Southern Ocean, 30,592,000. The highest mountain is believed to be Deodhunga, one of the Himalayas, 29,002 feet.

Of the 1,732,000,000 inhabitants of the globe, about 600,000,000 speak the principal European tongues, the English leading with 160,000,000; and of the total number it is estimated that about one-third are Christians.

THE METRIC SYSTEM OF WEIGHTS AND MEASURES

MEASURES OF LENGTH

Metric Denominations and Values		Equivalents in Denominations in Use
Myriameter	10,000 meters	6.2137 miles
Kilometer	1,000 meters	0.62137 mile, or 3,280 feet and 10 inches
Hectometer	100 meters	328 feet and 1 inch
Dekameter	10 meters	393.7 inches
Meter	1 meter	39.37 inches
Decimeter	$\frac{1}{10}$ of a meter	3.937 inches
Centimeter	$\frac{1}{100}$ of a meter	0.3937 inch
Millimeter	$\frac{1}{1000}$ of a meter	0.0394 inch
